ing upon the year. After the State and Federal agricultural agencies and other interests began giving prizes to boys in corn clubs and to girls in canning-food clubs, and all that, the production of corn per acre went up and the supply of vegetables for winter increased very much. Why? Because the boys made more corn? No. They did make more corn, but that could not affect the entire production in any appreciable percentage. They made more corn, I say, because in my county three or four boys made over 100 bushels to the acre, and a young fellow in South Carolina made 236 bushels, I believe, though I have forgotten the exact figures—anyhow, the largest production per acre in the Union. That was all in a country not regarded as a good corn country.

It does not compare with the "Egypt" country in Illinois, nor Indiana, nor Iowa as a corn country. The real increase came from this, that when these boys had learned it it astonished their fathers, and their fathers got on the methods which the boys had been taught and which resulted in this miraculous added production. Their fathers took advantage of the lessons which their children had learned, and the consequence has been that the production per acre has been increased enormously. That is not all; the Senator from Missouri tells us that we have been "marketing immature hogs." That is also erroneous. Southern corn has not been going into hogs for the market hitherto. No southerner felt that he could make money at fattening hogs with corn, because the corn in the market was worth more than the hogs. But so far from that statement of marketing immature hogs being true, I saw the report yesterday or the day before that the average weight of hogs in the American market had gone up some 20 pounds this year over the year before, and that I think is very largely due to the fact that in the South more hogs were kept, and the hogs were better fed. Instead of being merely called up to be fed when we were ready to kill them they were fed pretty nearly all the year around, not upon corn always but upon products of various sorts.

The Senator from New York is mistaken in thinking that prizes given to men for increased production in agriculture stop with the prize maker. The achievement goes all over his neighborhood. It spreads from one neighborhood to another. "You say that John Martin's boy raised 102 bushels of corn to the acre!" "Yes; I do. I saw it gathered and measured." "In the name of Heaven how did he do it?" Then, the other fellow sits down and tells him how it happened, how he fertilized, what sort of seed corn was planted, what was the species of cultivation, and all about it, and then the inquirer goes home and attempts at any rate to imitate him, and the emulation or rivalry spreads all over the country.

Mr. President, there are all sorts of expenditures made by the Federal Government less profitable than this, and I do not speak of war expenditures, because as far as I am concerned I would drop the appropriations for almost everything in the world, if necessary to have money in order to win the war. My soul is so wrapped up in this war that if I thought the other side of the Chamber could bring it to a successful termination and this side could not, I would be willing to give that side full power. I am so wrapped up in the necessity of winning it, caused by the conviction upon my part that national life will not be worth living unless we do win it, that I would not take one dollar from military purposes, and if I thought this money was to be subtracted from military purposes I would not do that. I would not vote, and will not vote, for a single new building nor park nor monument, and I will not vote for anything useful merely for peace purposes that we can postpone until after the war. But here is a direct war purpose. Increase the production of corn; increase the production of cattle; increase the production of hogs, into which the corn and the other agricultural products go. How? By forcing the people to do it? You can not do that under a free government. By inducing them to do it is the answer. In the South I know that the process of inducing has been begun, and that it has been very highly successful.

I served for 10 years in the House of Representatives upon the Agricultural Committee with the father of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. His father was the chairman of the committee, and I was its senior Democratic member. We held appropriations down to a reasonable point all the time. I have never been extravagant about an Agricultural appropriation bill. His father and I together saved the Treasury from the expenditure of many a useless dollar that was put on the bill for the purpose of "farming the farmer," and not for the purpose of farming the land. In this particular case, however, the Senator from New York is mistaken. This is a matter of great importance and will result in great good. My only objection to it is that, being of the utmost importance, we yet can not very well at this time appropriate any more than the bill now carries.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am going to ask the chairman of the committee if he will not consent to put this appropriation of $250,000 in another portion of the bill, where it will bring practical results? I presume the Senator has had before him, and that there has been before the committee, some argument concerning the rust and the methods of meeting the rust. I notice that $100,000 has been appropriated for that purpose.

Let me call the attention of the Senator in charge of this bill to the fact that three days of a change of weather in 1916 caused a loss in three States in the Union of very close to $100,000,000 in the value of a crop. That was caused by the black rust. The black rust differs in no respect from the yellow rust, except that the spore are a little older. Several hundred years ago, in France, after a careful investigation, it was found that the origin of these spores was located and that they were always developed on a certain kind of vegetation, which is known here as the barberry bush. Scientists and those of the highest standing in biology tell us that the rust spores always originate from the barberry bush hedges, and so forth; that, at least, they have never been known to originate anywhere else; that they will travel with the wind, and in a single day may spread over a thousand miles from the place of their origin.

Now, it is proposed to appropriate $100,000 for the eradication of the rust. The loss every year from that source will run into many millions of dollars; and, if the straw is exceptionally heavy and there is the likelihood of a moist season, the loss will even run into the hundreds of millions of dollars.

These same scientists say that the only remedy now is to destroy the barberry bush, which is used for hedges in different cities and throughout the States. You can not destroy them by an act of Congress, because we can not reach by our legislation into the States and assume police authority, but we can act in conjunction with the several agricultural States. I do not believe there is an agricultural college in any one of the States that does not agree, and absolutely agree, with the assertion that the rust spores always originate in the barberry bush, and if you can destroy that you can probably destroy the ravages of rust.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall do so in just one moment.

This bill carries about $28,000,000 or $29,000,000, if I remember rightly, and here is a damage that is never less than twenty-eight or thirty or forty million dollars in a year, and it often runs very close to a hundred million dollars in a year.

There is no necessity of studying further as to the question of where the rust originates, because I understand that all scientists practically agree about that. So it is not simply a question of destruction. That being the case, you will do a hundred times as much good if you will take that extra $250,000 that you now appropriate for prizes and provide that it may be used, in conjunction with the States, in the extermination of the barberry bush, from which originate the spores that destroy the crops of the Northwest.

I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desired to ask the Senator from North Dakota if it were possible, by spraying or other similar treatment, to destroy the insect, germ, or whatever it may be, that produces the rust. Is it necessary, in order to accomplish that object, to destroy the bush?

Mr. McCUMBER. When I state to the Senator from Mississippi that in a single day, if the wind is blowing in the right direction, those spores cover an acreage equivalent to three or four of the big States of the Union, he will see the impossibility of affording a remedy by spraying.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I did not ask the Senator if the spores could be killed by spraying after they fall on the wheat, but I asked the Senator if they could be destroyed by spraying the bush where they originate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, they might possibly be.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to say to the Senator that I shall cheerfully vote to give him or the farmers of his section any amount that he thinks could be prudently and profitably expended for the destruction of that pest, and I think the money would be well invested if the appropriation should be made. Agriculture is the base, the substratum, upon which all permanent prosperity rests in this country, and I deem it a privilege as well as a patriotic duty to vote for every measure which has for its purpose and that I believe will promote the interest and prosperity of the people who till the soil. I believe that any help to the farmers by the Government which increases their yield promotes the well-being of all classes of society.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is a limit, of course, to our right to expend the people's money. We can not in any appropriation bill give everything that we should like to give. We ought, however, to appropriate the money which is raised by taxation in such manner that its use will do the greatest possible good; and I insist that this $250,000, if it is used for the purpose of meeting the ravages of rust, will accomplish a thousandfold more good than it would be possible for it to accomplish in the matter of these prizes. I hope the chairman of the committee will be willing, if there can not be appropriated more than the amount which is provided for in this bill, to drop the provision which proposes to appropriate $250,000 for the purpose of giving prizes, and use it in meeting the evil of the rust.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to say that I do not underestimate the importance of the proposition which has been advanced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. The desirability of exterminating the source and origin of the rust must be obvious to every man. My recollection is that the committee gave what the department estimated upon that item. The Senator's argument has convinced me that the estimate was not sufficient. There is nothing binding about estimates. I shall not, therefore, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, hesitate to vote for an increase in that particular item.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask if the Senator knows whether or not the department made an estimate and advised the committee to place in the bill the item under consideration covering prizes?

Mr. GORE. No; I will say that it did not, Mr. President; and I will touch on that point in a moment. This was another instance where the committee felt that it had an opportunity to render some public service without a direct commission from the department to render that service.

I wish to say, in reference to the remarks of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], that I think he put his finger on the fundamental aspects of the present situation. I think that the Food Administration has discouraged production. I think the production of wheat this year will be less than it would otherwise have been. I think that is a misfortune, which certainly may amount to a calamity.

I also agree with him that perhaps the Food Administration and perhaps the Senate do not appreciate the real gravity of the situation. The president of Cornell University, which is one of the largest agricultural institutions in America, recently declared that there was only a narrow margin between this country and an inferno of starvation. That is pretty strong language; I do not know whether I should use language so strong as that; but I do know that the situation is serious, and that we may before long be looking famine in the face, which we ought to have averted. It is incumbent upon us to avert not only the danger but the possibility of a shortage of foodstuffs in this country, so far as human foresight can anticipate conditions, and meet them looking to that end.

Evidence is accumulating as to the food crisis which is threatened. I hope that before long a report may be submitted to the Senate, or an argument may be presented to the Senate, which will impress the gravity of the situation upon each and every Member of this body.

One of the Senator's complaints was that the amount provided in this amendment was not enough. I think that is the only objection to which the amendment is liable. I do not think it is enough.

I do not agree with the Senator that the prospect of prizes and premiums would not stimulate increased production. The spirit of emulation is one of the strongest instincts and impulses of human nature. It has impelled men to feats of heroism which mere sordid gain could never inspire. This is not a matter of theory; it has been applied in many of the Southern States. The production of corn in the Southern States has been doubled, and in many localities it has been trebled by the prizes which have been offered on the part of voluntary organizations and associations. I have proved my faith by my works. For five years in my State I gave an annual premium of $100 to the boys making the best record in contests between the boys' corn clubs in that State. Those contests, born of a spirit of emulation and a desire to excel, have borne splendid fruit in many of the Southern States.

There are 46 State fairs in the United States; there are 2,000 or more county fairs; and I have no doubt that by wise administration and distribution of these prizes and premiums production can be greatly stimulated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether all of those State fairs and all of those county fairs are not giving prizes for the best exhibition of the products of the farm?

Mr. GORE. I think they are; but the Committee on Agriculture felt that this was a national problem—not a State problem and not a local problem. The Committee on Agriculture was not willing to be outrun in this great national service by the States, by the counties, or by mere local organizations of merchants and commercial clubs. We felt that we ought to have sufficient vision to appreciate the importance of this situation. The Committee on Agriculture feels that some responsibility devolves upon it to aid in arousing interest in the conditions as they relate to food and to food supply, and in recommending any wise means possible which may contribute to a satisfactory solution of that problem. If these prizes increase production a half million dollars only, we will have realized 100 per cent profit on our investment. That it will do so, if wisely administered through the various State and county fairs, I think there can not be the slightest possibility of doubt.

While much has happened under the Food Administration which might profitably have happened otherwise—and I shall not be diverted at this point to a discussion of that question—the fact that it has done somethings it ought not to have done, that it has discouraged production, and that it may be beyond our power to remedy that situation, is no reason why we should not, so far as we can, meet our responsibility and discharge our duty at least by stimulating production. I hope the amendment will be adopted, and I have no doubt——

Mr. WILLIAMS. This will encourage States and counties and other organizations to offer additional prizes.

Mr. GORE. Undoubtedly it will, and the national prize, in addition to the State prize, would be an object worthy to be striven for and undoubtedly would be an object of ambition. Boys' corn clubs and boys' pig clubs and girls' poultry clubs throughout the country have contributed a great deal to increased production. Production, production, production is the supreme and paramount purpose to-day.

Some have minimized production by laying too much emphasis on distribution. I think that has been the fundamental defect in our policy up to this time. We have magnified the importance of distribution and have minimized the importance of production. A perfect system of distribution, the most elaborate and perfected machinery for distribution, would be utterly vain if there be nothing to distribute. We can not, Senators, overdo production this year. However much we may expand it, there will be an urgent and an insistent demand for more. We will hear from the lips of our allies the cry of the horse leech's daughter, worthily made, and it should be our desire to gratify it—more, more, more, and still more food. To meet that cry let us have more production, and in this instance let us resolve the doubt in favor of offering the prizes and premiums in the hope that it will stimulate production, and if it falls short of that result, if evil days come, if lean months come upon us in the future, let no one say that the Senate Committee on Agriculture at least was derelict in its duty. That is the theory upon which the committee acted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a few moments, because I have been called to the Committee on Banking and Currency; but, in addition to what my colleague [Mr. McCUMBER] has said, I desire to state that his estimate as to the loss from the black rust within one year alone is not high enough.

I desire to say to my colleague and to the Senate that we estimated in North Dakota in 1916 that we would produce 160,000,900 bushels of wheat, but, due to the black rust, as my colleague has stated, we raised only 39,000,000 bushels.

I have pleaded and pleaded with those in authority to make recommendations and ask for appropriations to destroy the barberry bush, because there is where the black-rust microbe originates. I have stood on this floor time and again asking Members of this body to take action, and calling the attention of the department to the necessity of increasing these appropriations in order to increase the production of grain, and I think we must all agree that that is highly necessary, especially at this time.

I am not opposed to this particular appropriation. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I was present when the amendment was proposed. I said at that time to the other members who were present that, while I had no objection to it, I knew of other methods which would be far superior to this one to increase production, especially of wheat.

I am glad the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is here, because I want to read to him and to the Senate a statement which can not be controverted. I heard the Senator from Mississippi say the other day that prices could not be fixed by law, but that ultimately they would be regulated and fixed on a competitive basis under the law of supply and demand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not want to be misquoted.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not desire to misquote the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say that prices could not be fixed, but I said if they were fixed the result would be either to disturb production if they were fixed too low or to encourage speculation if they were fixed too high.

Mr. GRONNA. That is absolutely true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course there is a psychological influence of an appeal to patriotism that might have some effect, but it is a natural economic law that governs, and there is no escape from it.

Mr. GRONNA. That is perfectly true. I wish at this point to read from a newspaper the quotations on different kinds of grain. On February 27 the market at Duluth, Minn., was, for No. 1 dark northern, $2.21; for No. 1 northern, $2.17; for No. 2 dark northern, $2.18; for No. 2 northern, $2.14; for No. 3 dark northern, $2.14; for No. 3 northern, $2.11; for No. 1 durum, $2.11; for No. 2 durum, $2.14; for No. 3 yellow corn, $2.14 to $2.15; for barley, $1.83 to $2.16; for rye, $2.53.

A bushel of barley has to weigh only 48 pounds, and yet, Mr. President, a bushel of barley is worth more in the market than a bushel of wheat. Every sensible man knows that a bushel of barley is not as valuable for food as a bushel of wheat. Every sensible man knows that a bushel of rye, weighing 56 pounds, is not as valuable for bread and for food as is a bushel of wheat. The economic conditions have been disarranged, and people in the agricultural sections of the country have been discouraged from producing wheat.

That is not the whole story. While we are talking about the microbes propagated on the barberry bush, let us refer also to the microbe at the other end which we have to confront every year, whether we have the barberry bush and the black rust or not, and that is some of the combinations and grain exchanges, also called chambers of commerce, which are always operating. I am going to take the time of the Senate when we reach the amendment which I introduced at the suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture, proposing that standardization of grades shall be fixed on milling tests, and he realizes now the importance of it. I will try to show the effects of the false standards now prevailing and also show the effects in the prices of grain. We will say that No. 1 hard wheat is mixed with 15 per cent of No. 1 winter wheat. One is as good and as valuable for flour as the other, but if there is a small percentage of this winter wheat mixed with the spring wheat it is reduced to No. 4. I have a sample of that kind on my desk. The difference in the price to the farmer is from 24 to 25 cents a bushel; and yet when we ask an appropriation of $50,000 for a little flour mill—and it is not intended to erect a building, but to provide machinery in order to make tests—but when it is proposed to fix standards based upon the baking and milling qualities of grain we are laughed to scorn by some of the Senators here, although the reduction in grade involves millions and millions of dollars of loss to the farmers of this country. That is how production is discouraged.

I understand the item for the flour mill has been passed over; I was not here at the time because I was in attendance upon other business of the Senate, but I understand that item has been passed over.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that amendment has been accepted.

Mr. GRONNA. I refer to the item for a flour mill to make tests as to milling and baking properties, and I understand it was passed over. It was designed to enable the Agricultural Department to make tests to ascertain the value of different kinds of grain and then to make their standardization accordingly. Yet Senators on this floor say that it is an extravagance to appropriate $50,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture or the Bureau of Standards to get the information which is needed in order to do justice not only to the section of the country from which I come but to the entire country.

Now, Mr. President, I am not objecting to the appropriation of $250,000 for prizes and premiums, as is proposed in this bill. I believe it will do some good and perhaps help to stimulate production; but why should we discriminate against the people in certain sections of the country, restrict the price on wheat, and discourage production, and then let the industries in the other sections of the country go unrestricted? The production of wheat can not be increased by any such method as is proposed here; I know that very well. Perhaps you can increase the production of vegetables and encourage some schoolmarm who has a few spare dollars to buy a pig and enter the new field of patriotic pig raising, or something of that sort, but you can not increase the production of wheat by promising such premiums as proposed in this amendment after having taken from the farmer his market, as you did a year ago.

What is the result? What did we have to do in my State this year? The governor of the State called the legislature together in extraordinary session for the purpose of enacting a law that would enable the counties in the State to issue bonds to buy seed and feed for the farmers and sell it to them on time. This is not a very good story to tell; it presents a gloomy picture, but it is true. It shows the financial condition of the wheat farmer. In my State there are many counties that have voted to bond themselves for upward of $300,000, to be used in the purchase of seed, to be sold to the farmers on time. Does that indicate that these people have made an unduly large amount of money? On the other hand, does it not indicate that they have been discriminated against and that they are unable to go on with their farming operations simply because they have not received as much for the product as it has cost them to produce it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying, but I wondered why the farmers did not have the seed wheat. Did they not raise enough wheat for seed or did they sell all the wheat they raised without reserving any for seed?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that I think the State raised more than enough to meet the seed requirements. In the so-called Red River Valley we raised a good crop. In the western section of the State the farmers averaged about from 2 bushels to 3 bushels to the acre, and that would have been more than enough for seed. The quality was exceptionally good; we raised no poor wheat in our State this year because we had a dry season, but every bushel of wheat cost them a great deal more than they received for it. The average for the State was about 7 bushels, and any man who knows anything about the cost of cultivating an acre of ground in the West knows that it can not be done for $14 an acre, without even taking into consideration the cost on the investment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What I am trying to get at is, why the farmers parted with their seed wheat? I supposed their primary duty was to keep enough wheat for next year's seed.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator that the reason why they parted with the seed was that they had to sell in order to meet certain obligations and in order to get something to eat, something to live on. That is the condition.

Mr. President, as I said, I shall not oppose this amendment; but I believe, as my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] said, that we should have appropriated more money for the destruction of the barberry bush, and we should also change the language so that we could be sure that we could use the money for its destruction. The language of this provision is to enable the department to study and to learn something about these insects. Why, we know what is to be done. It is the same with the barberry bush as it is with the cattle tick. All you have to do is simply to get the men and means to do it, to eradicate it, to get ride of it. That is all there is to it; and I doubt whether the Agricultural Department will let us use any of this money for the real destruction of the barberry bush.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand, then, the Senator wants to change the language so that it can be appropriated for the purpose of being used in cooperation with the State authorities for the destruction of the barberry bush. Is that it?

Mr. GRONNA. Exactly. That is what I should like to have done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it is known that that is the cause of this spore, it seems to me evident that there ought to be no indefiniteness about the language which will prevent its being used for the purpose of reaching the evil.

Mr. GRONNA. That is exactly the truth. There is no need of further study of it, because, as my colleague has said, practically all the scientists agree that it orginates in the barberry bush, and all we have to do to eradicate this evil is simply to destroy the barberry bush.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee again, I am not complaining at all against a proper appropriation to be expended in prizes. I agree that it may stimulate production to some extent, but I want the earnest and serious consideration of the chairman to this point:

He provides for an appropriation of $250,000 to be expended in prizes to stimulate production. He thinks that that may stimulate production $500,000, half a million dollars, in value. Possibly that is true; but what is more important than increasing the production half a million dollars is to decrease the destruction $100,000,000; and he appropriates only $100,000 to meet this great ravage, which, my colleague says, amounted in our State alone to more than $100,000,000 in a single year, while he appropriates $250,000, or two and a half times as much, to stimulate production which he himself thinks might produce half a million dollars more. It is the disproportion in the matter of these appropriations that appeals to me.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. The Senator does not have to reason with me about the importance of this matter. I have no objection. I hope the language will be changed, if a change be necessary or even desirable, so as to authorize the use of this money for the extermination of the barberry bush. I will say to the Senator that the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry increased the estimate for the rust $50,000. We were venturesome enough to increase that appropriation $50,000 without any special permit to do so. If that is not enough, I am willing to go farther, and I am willing to go faster. I doubt if anybody will go farther or faster than I will go in advocacy of any proposition which really promises, on the one hand, to stimulate production, to increase production, or, on the other hand, to obviate the artificial, arbitrary, or accidental destruction of production. I think that both purposes ought to be studiously observed. They are the same in effect.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say to the Senator that I think the language of the bill as proposed is sufficient to cover destruction. I do not think it is absolutely necessary as a matter of fact, although I think it is preferable to insert the words "for the destruction," because the provision is that $100,000 shall be set aside for the investigation and control of these diseases; and if the only method of control is the destruction of the barberry bush, where the germ originates, then I should think that that was broad enough to cover it. But I want to say to the Senator that before we get through with this bill I shall ask to have that $100,000 increased to $250,000, and I hope the Senator will agree also to an amendment that it shall be used in the investigation and the destruction of this particular bush. As I stated before, that can not be done without the assistance of the several States; but I do not know of a single agricultural State, in the spring-wheat section at least, that would not find means to assist in getting rid of every such bush in the State.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think it would be very short-sighted for the Senate to overlook anything which might carry out the Senator's object and stay the ravages of the spores originating with the barberry bush. The only point I was making is that we are associating here, in this debate, two things which have no relation to each other. It is desirable to have an abundance of milk available for infants and growing children. It is also desirable to find ways and means to eradicate infantile paralysis, but there is no reason to diminish the supply of available milk in order to eradicate the paralysis. Let us do both. Let us offer these prizes to stimulate production, and let us eradicate the barberry bush and eradicate the rust. It seems to me that the proposition which the Senator from North Dakota has advocated is not inferior to the proposition touching the cattle tick which was discussed here this afternoon. They are of equal importance; and it would be extremely short-sighted on the part of the Senate to practice an unwise or niggardly economy in arresting the prosecution of that work of eradication.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that if he will offer an amendment to carry out his views, I think——

Mr. GORE. We have not reached it yet.

Mr. GRONNA. My amendment would not be to the particular question now under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think if the question is put again, the Chair will be satisfied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 92, after line 20, in lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee, the Senator from Oklahoma proposes the following substitute:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and operate plants for the drying or dehydration of vegetables, fruits, and other edible products, including the erection or rent of necessary buildings and cooperation——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, is the Secretary reading the substitute or the amendment reported by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary is reading the substitute of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The SECRETARY (continuing)— with plants maintained and operated for the manufacture of such products, to purchase raw material, to standardize, sell, or otherwise dispose of dried products, and for all necessary expenses including salaries in Washington and elsewhere, $250,000, which sum shall be immediately available upon the passage of this act, and this fund may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1919.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Secretary has read the substitute, but I do not remember his having read the committee amendment for which it is a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask that the committee amendment may be read also?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 92, after line 20, the committee proposes to insert the following:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish plants for the drying and dehydration of vegetables, fruits, and other edible products, in connection with the land-grant colleges in the several States, $250,000: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may establish such plant at some other location in any particular State whenever in his judgment the public interest would be subserved thereby: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, establish such plant in any particular State in cooperation with States, counties, municipalities, individuals, or associations not organized for profit, in which case the Secretary of Agriculture shall not pay more than one-half of the cost of establishing such plant.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not heard the substitute until it was read and did not know the Senator from Oklahoma was going to offer it. I have prepared an amendment that I was going to offer to the committee amendment, but I will offer it to the substitute.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in view of the Senator's statement, I think it would be better to pass over this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to ask that it be passed over when my amendment is offered, so that it will be printed together with the substitute, because I expect to address the Senate at some length on this question of dehydration. I am not prepared to do it this evening.

I offer to the substitute the amendment that I send to the desk. It may be that it will not exactly correspond, because, as I say, I have had no opportunity to examine it; but if it does not, I will correct it later on, when it comes up before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Is there objection to the request that the amendment go over?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I hope it will take that course; and I ought to say, in justification of offering the substitute, that it was prepared by the department. I offered it without conference with the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry as a substitute for the committee amendment, but, as Senators know, I did not anticipate that the bill would come up for consideration this afternoon.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the amendment that I send to the desk be read by the Secretary.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir: let it be read, and then I will ask that the whole matter be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is this an amendment to an amendment or an amendment to a substitute for an amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. No; my amendment is offered as an amendment to the substitute. I have a right, as a matter of course, under the rules, to offer this amendment. A substitute is subject to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the further consideration of this amendment will be postponed for the day.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have my amendment read before it goes over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is in doubt as to whether the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is in order.

Mr. NORRIS. I can be read, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; let it be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the substitute proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, upon request of the President, to use all or any part of this appropriation for the establishment of such plant or plants at any place in the United States for the purpose of supplying food for the Army and Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the further consideration of this amendment will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was on page 93, after line 9, to insert:

Farmers' National Congress and Pan-American International Farm and Live-Stock Exposition.—To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with and make and exhibit illustrative of the investigations, products, and processes relating to farming in the United States at the Pan-American International Farm and Live Stock Exposition, to be held at Jacksonville, Fla., in conjunction with the Florida State Fair and Exposition, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, including labor and all expenses in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $10,000.

The President is hereby authorized to extend invitations to other nations to appoint delegates or representatives to the Farmers' National Congress, to be held at Jacksonville, Fla., in connection with said Pan-American International Farm and Live-Stock Exposition: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted or used for the expenses of delegates.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will inquire of the Senator if this is the first appropriation that has been made by the Government to assist the Pan-American International Farm and Live Stock Exposition to hold a session in conjunction with the Florida State Fair and Exposition, or any other State fair?

Mr. GORE. I will say that so far as I know this is the first appropriation; but the precedent was found in the appropriation for the International Dry Farming Congress, for which a series of appropriations has been made, extending over some five or six or seven years. At that congress exhibits are made from the various arid and semiarid States, and the Federal Government has been appropriating about $20,000 a year, I think, with the possible omission of last year, to make an exhibit representing the National Government at this international exposition. I believe this year it is to meet at Kansas City. So far as I know, this is the first appropriation for this particular purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Then hereafter we will have an annual appropriation, will we, for the Farmers' National Congress and Pan-American International Farm and Live Stock Exposition?

Mr. GORE. I should not imagine so.

Mr. SMOOT. I think we will, if we start it.

Mr. GORE. I do not know anything that justifies that apprehension.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator and to the Senate that this suggestion arises by reason of a very important meeting in Jacksonville, at the time of this State fair and exposition, of the Farmers' National Congress in conjunction with the Pan-American International Farm and Live Stock Exposition. The Farmers' National Congress and the Pan-American International Farm and Live Stock Exposition are all holding sessions on the exposition grounds, the exposition furnishing the buildings and all that sort of thing. This is a small appropriation to exhibit there what the Government has to offer, showing its investigations, products, and processes relating to agriculture, but mainly live stock and matters of interest both to the Farmers' National Congress and to this international exposition. It is a small appropriation of only $10,000. I think the Government usually makes those exhibits anyhow, but it is directly in line with precedents where these conventions or congresses have been held in Western States. In such cases appropriations similar to this have been made, but of a larger amount. I think it is entirely appropriate, and will be of very great advantage, because this Farmers' National Congress is itself a very large organization, and has a large membership, and is doing splendid work; and then, in addition to that, the International Farm and Live Stock Congress is a large organization, doing splendid work in that field. This is simply to furnish an exhibit there of the result of the investigations and studies of the Department of Agriculture, which will thus be carried to the members of these organizations that happen to be holding their session now at this exposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not at all surprised at the appropriation. Not only do I expect that this association will ask for $10,000 or more each year, but I expect that there will be new organizations established in the future, and, seeing that the Government appropriates annually certain amounts for these associations to meet at different parts of the country, they will be added to annually hereafter.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not been able to attend the session this afternoon. I should like to have the Senator from Utah tell me briefly of what advantage the Government is going to be to this exposition down in Jacksonville, Fla., for which this $10,000 is to be appropriated?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the only advantage is that unless the Government of the United States appropriates this money, perhaps the Farmers' National Congress and Pan American International Farm and Live Stock Exposition could not make a show at that State fair. They, perhaps, could not collect enough money in order to have their representatives down there. I think that is all there is to it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the United States to make an exhibit there, or to do anything as a Government which would be beneficial to the farmers?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there has been no appropriation for that purpose, and I doubt whether the Government does make an exhibit there. I think this is a Florida State fair and exposition.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will say in answer to the Senator from Michigan that the Florida State Fair & Exposition Co. is holding a State fair at Jacksonville. That happens to be going on. That fair will be held irrespective of any appropriation, and it is asking nothing from the Government. The Farmers' National Congress is not a Florida organization or a southern organization. The Pan American International Farm and Live Stock Exposition is not a southern organization nor a Florida organization. This is no appropriation made to either of those associations. This is simply to cover the expense of the Government making an exhibit where these organizations are holding their conventions. They happen to be holding them this time in Florida. If they had been held anywhere else we would not have heard a word about the matter, because the Government has appropriated year after year $20,000 for these congresses to be held in the semiarid States, and nobody has ever raised any objection to that action. It has been going on year after year. It happens now that the proposition is to appropriate $10,000 to cover the expense of an exhibit in Florida, and we hear a great deal of talk about it, and raise a lot of questions about it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What kind of an exhibit will the Government make down there?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Government has been making investigations and studies for years and years relative to the subjects in which this farmers' congress and this international congress are interested. I do not know what the exhibit covers. It covers a great deal; the result of their studies and investigations, and the point is to bring that result home to the members of the associations that are holding their convention at this point.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator believe that will be brought home to them in any other way than through lecturers sent out, possibly, Government representatives, and publications?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, no; they carry there the actual exhibits of what has resulted from their studies appertaining to the live-stock industry, all the diseases and ailments of animals, and that sort of thing. That is of immense educational value to the people engaged in those industries. They carry out those exhibits in cases. The exhibits are very considerable, I think, and very instructive. This is a place and an opportunity to bring these things home to the people who are engaged in those industries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment stated again.

The Secretary again stated the pending amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if he will not insert, after the word "shall," on page 94, line 2, the word "hereafter," so as to read:

Provided, That no appropriation shall hereafter be granted or used for the expenses of delegates.

I think that is the language that is generally used in the provisions affecting legislation of this sort.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection at all to that amendment, if the Senator desires to offer it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I move that the word "hereafter" be inserted after the word "shall," on line 2, page 94.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 4, after the words "Department of Agriculture," to strike out "$26,943,773" and insert "$28,058,933," so as to make the clause read:

Total carried by this bill for the Department of Agriculture, $28,058,933.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that will not be the correct amount of the total appropriation; but I take it for granted that it is understood that the clerks will have the right to put in the exact figures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerks will be authorized to correct the total.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a letter which I have received from the entomologist of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Mississippi, treating of the sweet-potato weevil—a new bug to me, but it seems he has been busy in the sweet-potato business for some years, and has operated extensively in the States of Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Alabama. He has been in Florada for very many years, and the people of the State of Florida have spent a great deal of money in the effort to exterminate this rapacious little bug. The importance of destroying the pests is seen in the fact that unless something is done to stop the ravages of this little insect it will materially reduce the great crop of potatoes, which amounts annually to something like $90,000,000. The sweet potato is a valuable article of food, and at this time anything that interferes with its production is an evil to be feared. The matter calls for prompt and vigorous attention on the part of the Government.

I also ask to have inserted in the RECORD an amendment, which I shall offer to-morrow or when the bill comes up for consideration, carrying an appropriation of $25,000 for the investigation and possible extermination of the pest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to will be included in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

MISSISSIPPI AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL COLLEGE,
Agricultural College, Miss., February 21, 1918.

Senator JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR VARDAMAN: I understand that an effort is being made to get an appropriation from Congress to be used in a campaign to eradicate the sweet-potato weevil, Cylas formicarius, from the Southern States, but that this item has been left out of the agricultural appropriation bill now before the Senate.

The sweet-potato weevil is by far the most serious insect pest of the sweet potato. From the nature of this insect it seems that it will not be a very difficult task to eradicate it. The insect seldom, if ever, flies, and is only known to feed upon the sweet potato and morning glory. At the present time our records show that this pest is only known to occur in four counties in Mississippi. These counties are Hancock, Harrison, Jackson, and Pearl River. We know of only 28 properties that are infested. There are probably many others that we do not know about. If steps are not taken to eradicate this pest, it will gradually spread to other properties until it becomes so generally distributed that eradication will be much more difficult. On one property in this State we found 99 per cent of the potatoes infested with these weevils, and on several other properties the infestations were as high as 85 to 90 per cent. In parts of Louisiana and Texas conditions are even worse, so far as this insect is concerned.

At this time, when we are in need of all kinds of foods, I believe that it is important that this pest be not allowed to spread further, and that every effort be made to eradicate it. I sincerely hope that the Secretary of Agriculture will be authorized to carry on this work.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

R. W. HARNED, Entomologist.

The proposed amendment of Mr. VARDAMAN is as follows:

For applying such methods of eradication or control of the sweet-potato weevil as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary, including the payment of such expenses and employment of such persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, in cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations, or individuals as he may deem necessary to accomplish such purposes, $25,000, which shall be immediately available, and, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, no expenditures shall be made for these purposes until a sum or sums at least equal to such expenditures shall have been appropriated, subscribed, or contributed by State, county, or local authorities or by individuals or organizations for the accomplishment of such purposes: Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the cost or value of sweet potatoes, sweet-potato plants, or other property injured or destroyed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 4, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, source of all good, help us to concentrate our wisdom, power, and influence, with our allies, with whom we are associated, against the powers of evil; that we may overcome their machinations and inhuman desires; and bring order out of chaos, peace out of war, righteousness out of evil, and establish liberty, truth, justice, righteousness in the heart of mankind; that Thy Kingdom may come in all its fullness, in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journals of the proceedings of Saturday, March 2, and Sunday, March 3, 1918, were read and approved.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. This is Unanimous-Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will report the first bill on that calendar.

RESERVE OF THE PUBLIC-HEALTH SERVICE.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was S. J. Res. 63, to establish a reserve of the Public-Health Service.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think that where bills have been passed over twice already they ought to go to the foot of the calendar. They ought not to be allowed to clog the calendar, and I suggest that if this joint resolution is passed over it be with that understanding—that it go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. BORLAND. Why is it to be passed over? This is a very important measure, and it seems to me we might pass it.

Mr. COADY. It is a very important measure, but I understand there is objection to it on the part of some Members.

Mr. BORLAND. The need for this public-health reserve is critical right now.

Mr. COADY. I agree with the gentleman. I would have it considered now if I felt that there would be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland to pass this joint resolution over without prejudice?

Mr. FOSTER. If it goes to the foot of the calendar I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but there is no rule to put it at the foot of the calendar.

Mr FOSTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to the matter being passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. But the trouble about that is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] does have objection to it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is hardly fair that a bill should be passed over day after day and retain its position at the head of the calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield in that particular? If the Chair will indulge me just a moment, I think there is considerable merit in the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]. I think that the Committee on Rules should bring in a rule providing for the consideration of bills on Unanimous-Consent Calendar day, so that the call of committees shall begin where it left off on the last preceding unanimous-consent day. Under the existing practice we rarely get to the bills that have been recently placed on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

The SPEAKER. All this is out of order. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objected to the present consideration of this joint resolution, and it will be stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, EASTERN DISTRICT OF MISSOURI.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 294) to provide for the appointment of an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Missouri.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice and placed at the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over and put at the foot of the calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object to the consideration of the bill, and also to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects to the whole thing. The bill will be stricken from the calendar.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was Senate joint resolution 110, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education," approved February 23, 1917.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I ask unanimous consent that this joint resolution may be passed over informally.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] asks unanimous consent that joint resolution be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Florida allow me?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The matter covered by this joint resolution was taken care of in the deficiency appropriation bill that recently passed the House, and there can be no need of it in case the item is agreed to in the Senate as it passed the House. I have no objection, however, to letting this matter go over until it is known whether the Senate agrees to the provision as incorporated in the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] asks unanimous consent that this joint resolution be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. To take its place at the foot of the line, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is all right, Mr. Speaker. We understand each other.

The SPEAKER. To be placed at the foot of the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Florida will allow me, I think there ought not to be any blanket authority granted to any officer of the Government to go where he pleases and when he pleases to put up buildings.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We are not talking about buildings. This is the educational matter.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought it was the building bill. This is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to passing this joint resolution over and putting it at the foot of the calendar?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I want to state my reason. It will take only a moment to do it.

My colleague [Mr. SEARS] is interested in the joint resolution and made the report. He is before a very important meeting of the Committee on Agriculture. I want it passed until he can be here on the floor.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that this joint resolution be passed over temporarily, so that it may be called up again to-day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POST OFFICES AT GLENDALE AND ALHAMBRA, CAL.

The next business on the calendar for unanimous consent was the bill (H. R. 7239) to amend the postal laws.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to reestablish two post offices in California.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I feel inclined from the information I now have in my possession to object, although I am willing to withhold it for further information if the gentleman from California can give it to us.

REESTABLISHMENT OF SECOND-CLASS POST OFFICES.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, this is not a bill to establish new post offices; it is to reestablish post offices which were formerly independent post offices but were discontinued against the will of the inhabitants of the cities in which they were situated. This is a bill simply to restore the status of second-class post offices in the cities of Glendale and Alhambra, Cal., discontinued several years ago and made substations of the city of Los Angeles. If gentlemen desire further information before consideration of the bill I can give it.

Mr. GARD. By whose order were the post offices discontinued and made substations?

Mr. RANDALL. By order of the Postmaster General; and they can not be reestablished as post offices of the second class except by enactment of Congress.

Mr. GARD. When were they discontinued?

Mr. RANDALL. About seven years ago.

Mr. GARD. And they have since operated as substations?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes. I will ask the Clerk to read the resolution of the city councils of the two cities and the chambers of commerce of Alhambra and Glendale.

ALHAMBRA, CAL., February 15, 1918.

Hon. CHARLES H. RANDALL, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Alhambra Chamber of Commerce held February 5, 1918, I was authorized to convey to you the wishes of the chamber concerning an independent post office for Alhambra and to assure you that the members of the chamber are back of you in the undertaking.

This is a city of 10,000 population, with a property valuation amounting to the sum of $15,000,000. We have 66 miles of streets, of which 45 miles are paved and 50 miles are illuminated with an ornamental lighting system. We have spent over $700,000 in streets and sidewalks alone.

The building which is being used for post office at present is really an insult to the intelligence of the people of this city, not only being too small and inadequate altogether, but the same is closed at 6.30 every evening and one is unable to obtain mail from the boxes after that time.

It might be well at this time for me to cite an instance which occurred about eight months ago, when an $80,000,000 corporation opened its offices in this city and were unable to rent a post-office box adequate to their needs, with the result that they were compelled to take one of the small boxes at a monthly rental of 15 cents. This will give you an idea as to the character of advertising our city is getting from our post office.

I am inclosing herewith a few photographs and cuts which will show you the character of our post office as compared with our other buildings.

In order to advise you of the caliber of the residents of this city, I might take this opportunity to inform you that we oversubscribed our quota in each of the liberty loan campaigns, together with the Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. movements.

In conclusion, kindly be informed that it is the unanimous desire of this body, the Alhambra Chamber of Commerce, that the Government establish an independent post office in this city, although we know it will cause considerable increase in our expense, due to the additional postage that will be required between here and the city of Los Angeles.

ALHAMBRA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
M. B. GRAVES, Secretary.

RESOLUTION OF CITY COMMISSION OF ALHAMBRA, CAL.

Whereas Representative C. H. RANDALL has presented to the House of Representatives bill No. 7230, which is a bill to reestablish as a post office of the second class the substation of the post office at Los Angeles, Cal., known as Alhambra; and

Whereas the City Commission of the City of Alhambra believes that said change from a branch office to an independent office will prove a material benefit to the entire city: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the city commission heartily approves the action of Representative C. H. RANDALL and earnestly urges the passage of this bill; and be it further

Resolved, That the city clerk of the city of Alhambra be, and he is hereby, instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to Representative C. H. RANDALL.

Ayes: Commissioners Hall, Bailey, Williams, and Stuart.

JAMES STUART,
President of the Commission of the City of Alhambra.

The foregoing resolution was duly adopted at a regular meeting of the commission of the city of Alhambra held on the 4th day of February, 1918.

ALBIN E. JOHNSON,
City Clerk of the City of Alhambra.

RESOLUTION OF CITY COUNCIL AND CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF GLENDALE, CAL.

GLENDALE, CAL., February 17, 1918.

Hon. C. H. RANDALL,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

At a joint meeting of members of board trustees and chamber of commerce of Glendale, Cal., the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas Glendale is city of 13,000 and has contiguous thereto 3,000 additonal, and is entitled to an independent post office: Therefore

"Resolved, That we hereby affirm our former action and petition for an independent post office to serve needs of our city and population tributary thereto."

J. S. THOMPSON,
Chairman, Board of Trustees.
A. T. COWAN,
President, Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, these cities are not suburbs of Los Angeles. They are independent cities; in one case 7 miles from the Los Angeles post office, and in the other case 8 miles. The service given by the substation method has been entirely unsatisfactory.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What is the reason given by the Postmaster General for their discontinuance?

Mr. RANDALL. The Postmaster General is willing to reestablish the offices. The initiative was taken in the city of Los Angeles, which desires to consolidate all the cities of Los Angeles County with that city, and it began by influencing the department to discontinue the independent post offices. That is the origin of it.

Mr. FOSS. Is there any proposition by Los Angeles to annex these cities?

Mr. RANDALL. None in an official way, except the agitation in the city of Los Angeles.

Mr. FOSS. But there has been no vote or referendum?

Mr. RANDALL. No.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHEELER. Has unanimous consent been given for the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. WHEELER. Then why can we be considering it at this time?

The SPEAKER. Because the gentleman from Wisconsin reserved the right to object.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the only action we have had on this question of annexation is in the case of the city of Tropico, lying between Glendale and Los Angeles, which recently voted on a proposition to annex to Los Angeles, and voted it down. Then at a later election Tropico voted to annex to Glendale. Apparently some cities would rather annex themselves to cities outside than to Los Angeles.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Do I understand that these post offices were established as substations by the department without action of Congress?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; the offices were discontinued by the Postmaster General and made substations, but he has no power to reestablish them except as post offices of the fourth class. In such a case there is no money available for clerk hire or carrier service.

Mr. GILLETT. Then I understand that the Postmaster General has power to destroy but not to restore?

Mr. RANDALL. He has power to destroy any presidential post office, but he can not restore it without action of Congress.

Mr. GILLETT. When was this done?

Mr. RANDALL. About seven years ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the attitude of the present Post Office Department as to a change of the status of postal stations tributary to large city post offices?

Mr. RANDALL. I can not inform the gentleman as to the general attitude, but I can say that the Post Office Department drew the language of the bill in this particular case.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman a letter from the Postmaster General in which he says that he approves of this?

Mr. RANDALL. No. The First Assistant Postmaster General was before the Post Office Committee and interrogated, and there he drew the language for this bill. The Post Office Committee has unanimously recommended the passage of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, until we have some express recommendation from the Postmaster General favoring this administrative policy I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries within the former Colville Indian Reservation.

The message also announced that the President had, on March 1, 1918, approved and signed bill of the following title:

S. 3389. An act to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire, and to sell or otherwise dispose of improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 92. Joint resolution providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries within the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.

FOREIGN DECORATIONS AND MEDALS OF HONOR.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the two next bills on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, S. 2796 and S. 1720, be passed momentarily, as both Mr. SHALLENBERGER and Mr. ANTHONY are attending a meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report both of these bills by title, and the Chair will then put the request.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2796. An act to permit American citizens to wear medals or decorations received from certain foreign countries on entering the military or naval service of the United States, and for other puposes.

S. 1720. An act to provide for the award of medals of honor and distinguished service medals.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York requests that the bills just reported by the Clerk be passed temporarily, to be brought up later, when the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] are in the Chamber. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DESERT-LAND ENTRYMEN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 175) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and for prior years, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as no member of the Committee on Public Lands is present, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill comes from the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. STAFFORD. It does.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is any member of the Committee on Public Lands present?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think that committee is engaged in important hearings on the leasing bill at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill merely seeks to extend the date of a bill that passed here in 1915 so as to permit certain entrymen that entered under the desert-land law a few months subsequent to the passage of this act to have the benefits of the provisions of the law. It is a remedial measure of minor character in which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] is interested.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have not a copy of the bill before me, but from what the gentleman from Wisconsin has just said, the bill we passed in 1915 allowed certain entrymen who had already made certain entries to have certain privileges, and now this amendment, he says, merely permits other people who made entries after that to have the same privilege. It strikes me that this grants a privilege of some consequence.

Mr. STAFFORD. To permit those who made entry, as I recall it, in the few weeks pending the legislation, to have the same privileges as were conferred by the law that was passed at that time. I may say that this bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, as is evidenced by a letter which is incorporated in the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the last three paragraphs of section 5 of the act of March 4, 1915, "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915, and for prior years, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended and made applicable to any lawful pending desert-land entry made prior to March 4, 1915: Provided, That in cases where such entries have been assigned prior to the date of the act the assignees shall, if otherwise qualified, be entitled to the benefit hereof.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have a minor amendment which I desire to offer, on page 2, line 1, after the last "the," to insert the words "approval of this."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "the," where it occurs the last time in the line, insert "approval of this."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman from Wisconsin explain precisely what that amendment does.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this proviso grants the privileges of this act, not only to those who entered upon the land under the desert-land laws in the period prior to March 4, 1915, and subsequent to July 1, 1914, but to any assignees of those entrymen in which the assignment has been made prior to the approval of this act. The purpose of the proviso is to grant the same privilege to the assignees of these entrymen as to the original entrymen, and the purpose of my amendment is merely to clear up the phraseology; but if there is any objection to it I shall withdraw it, because it is merely to improve the phraseology.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. All of these entrymen could assign to the same assignee?

Mr. STAFFORD. They could under the provisions of the bill as recommended by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do I understand the gentleman's amendment is to clarify the meaning of the language on page 2 of the bill, "prior to the date of the act"?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. And how does the gentleman propose it shall read?

Mr. STAFFORD. "Prior to the date of the approval of this act."

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that enlarges the bill very much.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that was the purpose of the framer of the bill; but if there is objection I shall withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I suggest to him that the real amendment ought to be to make this language so clear as to indicate without doubt that the assignment must have been made prior to March 4, 1915.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky it was not the purpose, as the gentleman will see from reading the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, to limit the privileges to only those assignees who received the assignment prior to that date.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why should it not be?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am merely carrying out the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior. Under the original law incorporated in the appropriation bill, which this is seeking to amend, the privilege was granted to all assignees of these rights up to a certain date.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Secretary does not seem to be overly enthusiastic about the bill at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I agree with the gentleman that it merely extends certain privileges to certain entrymen who made entry in an interregnum so as to give them the same privileges. I am merely doing this in the absence of the gentleman from Colorado, who is engaged in committee work.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the way the act is now drawn it is limited to that date, so I am willing to let it go.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I withdraw my amendment upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TIMBERLAKE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF SETTLERS UNDER FORFEITED CAREY ACT PROJECTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5559) to authorize a preference right of entry by certain Carey Act entrymen, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know something about a bill as important as this before it passes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to explain the bill to the gentleman and to the House. Mr. Speaker, in several of the Western States there are a number of what are known as "Carey Act" irrigation projects. Those projects are started by agreement between the Federal Government and the various States. The States enter into an agreement with some large corporations to build large irrigation ditches, reservoirs, and so forth, and allow settlers to come in and take a 160-acre homestead on those projects. On some of those projects the companies that have agreed to build the ditches have fallen down. They have been unable to get the money to finance the proposition, or the available supply of water has proven insufficient, and for various reasons the parties have been unable to go ahead with it, and there are a number of those projects where hundreds of people have been living on the land for a number of years, hanging on the best they could, and improving their claims as much as they can, and waiting and hoping that some day the company would build its ditches and extend water to their land. After nearly 10 years of waiting, the Interior Department has the authority, under certain conditions, to cancel and forfeit the project and declare the lands thereunder open to entry under the public-land laws, and there is no law that allows those settlers on these Carey Act projects any prior or preference right to take or hold their claims. They may have lived on their land 5 or 10 years, they may have put in all the improvements they could, and all of their time, and yet, when the entry is canceled the land is thrown open to public entry by the Interior Department; if somebody else can get a faster horse and beat these men to the land office, they can file on the land and get the first right to it and beat the man out of his home. This bill of mine merely gives the settler who has established a bona fide residence upon the land, made valuable and permanent improvements upon the land, 90 days' prior right to file upon the land that he is living on. This bill, if passed, would hold that claim as against all strangers 90 days for the rightful occupant to go to the land office and file on it. The bill is very short, and reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior, when restoring to the public domain lands that have been segregated to a State under section 4 of the act of August 18, 1894, and the acts and resolutions amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, commonly called the Carey Act, is authorized, in his discretion, and under such rules and regulations as he may establish, to allow for not exceeding 90 days, to any qualified person, a preference right of entry under applicable public land laws of any of such lands to which such person had initiated a claim under the State laws, and upon which such person had established actual bona fide residence, or had made substantial and permanent improvements.

This bill was referred to the Department of the Interior for recommendation, and the Acting Secretary reported thereon as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, August 20, 1917.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of your letter dated August 3, 1917, transmitting a copy of H. R. 5559, introduced by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

In the operation of the Carey Act it has unfortunately occurred that lands segregated thereunder to a State, and entered under the State laws by individuals, have been eventually abandoned by the State, with consequent prejudice to the interests of its entrymen, whose legal rights depend upon those of the State, and terminate with the cancellation of the segregation. The purpose of the bill is to minimize the losses of such entrymen, so far as it may be done. The bill as presented is workable, but it is believed that with slight changes in phraseology the purpose can be better effectuated.

The bill is intended to apply to every case where lands are eliminated from a segregation under the Carey Act and the introductory clause, "In cases where Carey Act projects upon the public lands are not consummated by the States holding same," adds nothing to the meaning of the act, and might well be eliminated, since there is a possibility that some might take the clause to limit the operation of the act to cases where the project is abandoned in its entirety, while the bill should cover, as well, cases where only part of the lands are eliminated from the project.

The granting of the preference right is in the nature of an equitable action, and should be granted only when the equities are clear. It would be difficult to provide, in advance of actual consideration of cases, for general rules that would be applicable to all cases. While some such "claims" initiated under the State laws are meritorious, others are of a more or less doubtful character. Accordingly, it would appear that the Secretary should have the authority to allow the preference in his discretion, and to make special rules in any particular case that seemed to require such action, as, for instance, in restricting the preference right to those who had made entry prior to a specified date, on which the State had been advised of the opinion of the department or of the General Land Office, that the water supply would be insufficient. It should be stated in this connection that it is not now the practice of the States to allow filings under the State law until the successful completion of the project is reasonably assured.

Ordinarily the only law under which the contemplated entries could be made would be the homestead law. However, it might be well to broaden the scope of the act to include any applicable public-land law so as to govern any exceptional cases that might arise in which entries could be made under other laws.

It is accordingly suggested that the act be amended to read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, when restoring to the public domain lands that have been segregated to a State under section 4 of the act of August 18, 1894, and the acts and resolutions amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, commonly called the Carey Act, is authorized, in his discretion, and under such rules and regulations as he may establish, to allow for not exceeding 60 days to any qualified person a preference right of entry under applicable public-land laws of any of such lands to which such person had initiated a claim under the State laws, and upon which such person had established actual bona fide residence or had made substantial and permanent improvements."

Cordially, yours,

ALEXANDER T. VOGELSANG,
Acting Secretary.

The committee adopted the substitute recommended by the Interior Department as an amendment, the only change being to extend the time in which entrymen are allowed to take advantage of the law to 90 days rather than limit it to 60 days, because of the fact that in many cases the settlers would not be able to learn of their rights within the 60 days recommended by the Secretary. The time really ought to be longer, because some of these settlers have gone into the Army or Navy and are now in France.

There have been started in former years a very large number of Carey Act projects throughout the Western States. Some of them have been successful, others have been partially successful, and a number of them have already been forfeited, and many others undoubtedly ought to be and will be forfeited, because of their utter failure. These failures have very few been fraudulent, or through bad faith, or bad management. Many of them have been started through a misunderstanding of the quantity of water available, and through incompetency in engineering, and failure to properly estimate the necessary expenses of construction of reservoirs and dams and canals, etc., and some have failed through the inability of the parties to properly finance their enterprise. In many cases large numbers of innocent home-seekers and poor people have been induced to go upon these projects and locate upon 160 acres of land and commence improving it.

Many of them have built houses and lived there in good faith for years, claiming the land and improving it as best they could without any water to irrigate with, waiting and hoping that the irrigation works would be constructed. And after spending years of time and labor and money the projects have proven a failure and been abandoned and forfeited and thrown open to settlement by the Secretary of the Interior. At the present time there is no law that in any way protects the prior rights of the settlers upon those projects to the lands they actually occupy. When the lands are thrown open to entry, any person who can beat them to the land office can file and get a first right to the land upon which these settlers have spent many years of hard labor and time and all of their money toward improving and making a home.

This bill merely protects them to the extent of giving them a 90 days' preference or prior right after the land is forfeited and thrown open to entry by the Secretary of the Interior in which they may go to the land office and file upon the lands themselves under the homestead law or the desert-land law, or the preemption law in some cases—that is, they can file under whatever law that is applicable to the character of land that is thrown open to entry. No one could take more than 160 acres, because that is all he can take under the Carey Act, and that would be the extent of the amount of land that he is living upon or improving. It is a humane measure in the interest of protecting the homes and improvements and property rights of these pioneer settlers who have in good faith been trying under the Carey Act projects to acquire a home. The Government loses nothing under this proposed act, and certainly the people who are living upon and who have improved the land are more entitled to a first claim to the land and a preference right to enter it than a mere stranger who has done nothing toward living upon or improving it. For the above reasons the committee is heartily in favor of expeditiously passing this bill, because several of those projects will probably be forfeited and opened to entry in the near future.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does it not do this: Does it not give him an inducement to take this matter out of the Carey Land Act and put it in the hands of the Government, and thereby put a burden on the Government in connection with irrigation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; the bill has no such effect or tendency. I do not think so; no.

Mr. SHERLEY. If he had not a preferential right, he would still try to get the State to do what it agreed to do and had fallen down on.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The State and the settlers have been trying for many years to induce the promoters of the projects to complete work and furnish water to the lands under it. These projects have been started in good faith, but the difficulties encountered have been too great and they have been unable to complete the projects.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say this to him: It is impossible for a Member to examine bills of this character who is not familiar with them as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, so as to determine whether they ought to be taken up by unanimous consent. I do not think the Committee on Public Lands should ask of the Congress constant consideration by unanimous consent of bills of this magnitude. They ought to be taken up as other public bills are on the regular calendar, and I shall for that reason object to its consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will withhold the objection, but I am going to make it on account of the principle I have announced.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not. This is a very simple matter, and it is an act of such simple justice, if my friend will listen to me, that there certainly ought to be no objection to it.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, he does not get the point of it at all——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit the bill to remain on this calendar until I have an opportunity to more fully explain it to him and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice and go to the foot of the calendar. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts agree to that?

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. It is so ordered, and the bill goes to the foot of the calendar.

AMENDMENT TO THE ESPIONAGE ACT.

The next bill in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8753) to amend section 3, title 1, of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right, I do not think we ought——

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not hear the gentleman; he had his head tucked down.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am making myself heard now.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to explain the effect of this amendment to section 3 of the espionage act.

The committee amended section 3 of the espionage act by inserting the following words:

Or shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to obstruct the sale by the United States of bonds or other securities of the United States or the making of loans by or to the United States.

It is perfectly apparent, Mr. Speaker, that any man who falsely and willfully circulates a report for the purpose of injuring the sale of bonds upon which the success of this war is bound to be based ought to be declared to be guilty of an offense and punished, and that is all this bill does as an amendment to section 3 of the espionage act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection whatever to this amendment. I think we need some legislation going even further than this goes. The reason for my reserving the right to object was this, that I think with matters that are not purely local—private bills, practically—that we ought to have some sort of explanation made to the committee touching them before they are taken up on this calendar. If we do not do it, all of us are going to wake up with regret touching some bills that will go through under misapprehension or nonappreciation of their importance. I have no objection to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8753) to amend section 3, title 1, of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of title 1 of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States, or to promote the success of its enemies, or with intent to obstruct the sale by the United States of bonds or other securities of the United States or the making of loans by or to the United States, and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully cause or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall willfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of the service or of the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both."

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Insert, on page 2, line 7, the words: "shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

The SPEAKER. This is a House Calendar bill. The Speaker will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] a question. Perhaps he made a statement, but I did not hear it through the confusion in this part of the Chamber, definitely stating how this amends the existing law. I did not understand that he so stated. I wish he would kindly explain it. I could not get it from the reading which the Clerk just made.

Mr. WEBB. Section 3 of the espionage act contains these words:

Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States, or to promote the success of its enemies, or—

And this amendment adds—

shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements—with intent to obstruct the sale by the United States of bonds or other securities of the United States or the making of loans by or to the United States.

I may say that this amendment is urgently recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney General. They say they know of a number of cases where disloyal persons have been going around making false reports in order to influence people against the buying of liberty bonds. And a man who does that is disloyal, and we think the act ought to be amended so as to make him guilty of a crime.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The purpose of this bill is to make it a crime and punishable as a crime any act that tends to obstruct this Government in the sale of its bonds?

Mr. WEBB. Not any act, but any false statement deliberately made for the purpose of obstructing the sale of bonds.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think it is timely legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For instance, Judge Rutherford, of Georgia, I think, who is the president of the American Bible Study Club, a successor to Pastor Russell, has been going through the Northwest to advise people to get rid of their bonds, in that we are going to have a revolution in this country. Will this get a man of that character?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so. It is hardly that broad. I think this bill covers prospective purchases and not those already made.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. Has this committee under consideration additional legislation dealing with this broad general subject?

Mr. WEBB. Not with reference to bonds.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but the general subject of acts of people ill disposed toward the Government that do not come technically under the law as to sedition or treason?

Mr. WEBB. We have a bill which we are going to offer as a substitute to the bill S. 383, defining what war utilities and premises are, and make it a crime for anybody to injure or obstruct those war utilities, which will get the man who can not be convicted of treason, and yet commits an offense that ought to be punishable.

Mr. SHERLEY. How soon may the House hope to have it?

Mr. WEBB. I hope to have that in the House by Wednesday. The committee has agreed on a substitute.

Mr. COX. I want to ask the gentleman a question along the line propounded by the gentleman from Kentucky, as to the proposition which his committee will bring out probably soon.

Take a case of this kind, where a citizen of this country advises drafted soldiers to go into the Army, learn drilling tactics, and become efficient in the use of the gun, in that the time will come when those soldiers will be asked to turn their guns upon the President of the United States. I am told down here at the Department of Justice that with declarations like that, that do not amount to treason, there is no Federal law that will catch men of that kind, and it strikes me they ought to be caught and prosecuted most vigorously. Now, will your proposed bill touch men of that kind?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir. We have been as diligent as possible in passing all the legislation recommended by the heads of these departments, including the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Treasury, but of course new conditions arise and demand new legislation, and we shall meet them as rapidly as the rules of the House permit.

Mr. SHERLEY. The point I was asking the gentleman about, I think, is the same point the gentleman from Indiana is interested in. We are constantly told of instances arising in different parts of the country where the department claims to be unable to act because there is no penal statute that covers the case. Now, there is no doubt that the sentiment of this Congress and the country is such that they do not propose to tolerate the continuation of those acts, and if additional legislation is needed it ought to be forthcoming.

Mr. WEBB. I want to say to my friend that I agree with him, and the legislation, so far as that is concerned, will be presented to the House.

Mr. COX. In that connection, now, does the Attorney General recommend any legislation as suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky and myself?

Mr. WEBB. It covers the legislation suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky, and we will offer it as a substitute for Senate bill 383.

Mr. COX. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I am not expressing any dissent from what the committee is going to do, but it strikes me that if the Department of Justice is correct in its opinion as to what the law is now—and no doubt the department is correct—we ought to have some wider and broader and deeper legislation in this country that would reach out and take hold of the men who are uttering seditious statements against this Government, criticizing the President right and left, and talking about a revolution to come.

Mr. WEBB. I think a great many of those people have been arrested by the authorities and put in jail under the espionage and other acts.

Mr. COX. I have been trying my best to have action taken, but it seems I can not do it to save my life.

Mr. JUUL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. JUUL. I rise to say that I wish the gentlemen would let us in on this debate.

Mr. WEBB. The Committee on the Judiciary of the House is in close touch with the Department of Justice, and we are gladly acting on practically every suggestion which they make to us.

Mr. COX. I am seeking information, because I am called upon almost every day to advise some action back in my district. Suppose a case of this kind comes up: A man says to another man, "You and I should stand together, and your people and my people should stand together, because there is going to be a revolution in this country before long, and we have got to stand together in this thing." If a case like that is brought to the attention of the Department of Justice, or a case similar to that, I am told that there is no remedy for it. I am told that "it is all up to the boys on the hill." Has the gentleman in view such legislation as that?

Mr. WEBB. No recommendation as to that has been made to us.

Mr. COX. They told me that they had substantially that kind of legislation, I think, embodied in the espionage act last fall, designed to cover the very case I was citing, but that it was cut out up here. They said that if we enacted such legislation they would enforce it down there.

Mr. WEBB. I have no recollection of such legislation being proposed, but we thought, and the country thought, that the espionage act covered practically every offense that we could then think of.

Mr. COX. It may not have been the espionage act that they referred to, but they said they had urged it, and that Congress had eliminated it.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. GARD. I would suggest that the language of section 3 might cover the case suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. What does it provide?

Mr. GARD. It provides that—

Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States, or to promote the success of its enemies, or with intent to obstruct the sale by the United States of bonds or other securities of the United States or the making of loans by or to the United States, and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully cause, or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty, in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall willfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of the service or of the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both.

Mr. COX. Well, it strikes me that that is pretty broad language.

Mr. GARD. I do not see how it could be broader. If the Department of Justice wants it, it seems to me they could get action under that clause.

Mr. COX. Why not pass it?

Mr. WEBB. That is in the law now—a part of the espionage act, which came from our Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COX. Well, then, if I may express my opinion, it is that we have plenty of law now.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I want to make a statement and call it to the attention of the gentleman and to the committee. I recently received information of a thoroughly reliable character—and I got it at first hand—that efforts will undoubtedly be made by sinister individuals to reduce the agricultural output, especially of the Northwest, where breadstuffs are grown, the method being to try to organize farm hands and cause them to strike at the critical or harvest time.

This is not anything new. They have been at it for two or three years. I refer to the Industrial Workers of the World. They have tried it in North Dakota. They tried it farther west, and apparently agents are now busy in Minnesota. Unfortunately, however loyal people may be as a whole in any region, there are always some malcontents. In addition, the Industrial Workers of the World, during the year 1916, brought on a big strike in the iron mines of my State. The iron mines are now running at their full capacity, and they are furnishing 75 per cent of all the iron ore used in this country.

The department was able by extra activity and the thorough cooperation of local people to prevent that which was attempted in the way of organizing strikes in the iron mines shortly after we entered the war. I find that these same agents are just now getting busy up in that country. If a man sets a wheat stack on fire or burns an elevator or bridge he has committed a crime and may be punished; yet that crime is mild compared to that of an individual who goes among farm hands and pours into their ears the worst kind of seditious stuff quietly and privately and forms them into an organization that will cause them to strike and demand impossible conditions about the time the harvests are on. I hope I am not seeing things dark, or through a dark glass. I do not think I am, but I know that that danger exists.

Mr. WEBB. Have you got a State law providing against that kind of activity?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We have not a State law providing for that kind of activity. I do not think there is any State law that provides that men can not organize. Men have the right to organize themselves into any kind of an economic organization.

Mr. WEBB. But that amounts to disloyalty or treason.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. These things are not really economic, although on their face they may appear to be so. They are absolutely hostile to the welfare of the country. It seems to me the General Government ought to be armed with full legal authority promptly to handle a situation like this, if the committee can formulate legislation that will do more good than harm.

Mr. WEBB. If the State government can not pass such legislation, how can the Federal Government?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The State can not pass such laws that will protect the Government.

Mr. WEBB. It can pass laws that will protect itself and the Government, and ought to. The gentleman says the State government has no right to prevent a man from going around and organizing labor organizations; neither has the Federal Government such right or, at present, such inclination. If you go further and make a man guilty of organizing for the purpose of interfering with the prosecution of the war, you can get him under the State and Federal Governments both.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I hope the gentleman will support legislation of that character.

Mr. WEBB. I rather think a man of that kind can be caught under the espionage law that we passed last summer, and he ought to be apprehended, because he is a dangerous character and a dangerous citizen.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBB, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COCONINO AND TUSAYAN NATIONAL FORESTS, ARIZ.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 273) to extend the time for cutting timber on the Coconino and Tusayan National Forests, Ariz.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LAND IN BATTERY COVE, ALEXANDRIA, VA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8834) authorizing the sale of a tract of land lying below the original high-water line of the Potomac River in what is known as Battery Cove, at Alexandria, Va.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, and Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado reserved the right to object.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to explain this bill if I may have the opportunity. A dispute arose between the United States Government and certain private parties as to the ownership of certain lands in Alexandria. It was agreed that the dispute should be transferred from the land to the purchase price of the land. Certain parties wanted to buy the land for private purposes, and the Secretary of War and the United States Government entered into a contract with the other claimants for the land that the Government should sell the land to these parties who desired to buy it and that the money should be paid into court and the question litigated to determine who was entitled to the purchase money.

The bill has been approved by the Secretary of War. The letter of the Secretary of War is here, desiring that the bill pass, and it has been favorably reported by the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the gentleman under what authority the Secretary of War enters into a contract to sell this land?

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. He simply agrees that these parties shall purchase it, the title to the land being in litigation in the courts.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. This is to give him the authority to do that.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I did not understand—how he could do it without authority from Congress. I understand that this land was reclaimed by the Federal Government, that there are nearly 47 acres of it, and now there is a manufacturing plant there building ships, so the report says, and they want to get this land in order to be used by this ship-manufacturing company.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. I so understand.

Mr. FOSTER. Now it is proposed to sell the land to the ship-manufacturing company for $70,000.

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Something like that.

Mr. FOSTER. I see that the rent of the land amounts to $42,000 a year.

Mr. CARLIN. Four thousand two hundred dollars, which is 6 per cent on the amount of the proposed purchase price.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not give them a lease of this land instead of selling it? What is the objection?

Mr. CARLIN. It is to be leased for five years under this agreement. I can explain the reason for this. The expenditure require to be made on the land by the shipbuilding company is about $1,500,000, and they are unwilling to make that expenditure without owning the title to the land.

Mr. FOSTER. They refuse to make it unless they can buy the land?

Mr. CARLIN. There is a claim by the Government to the ownership of the fee.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that.

Mr. CARLIN. Against the riparian owner. The title is in dispute. The Government has not yet established its claim. The shipbuilding company have bought the rights of the riparian owners and have negotiated a contract with the Secretary of War, subject to the authority of Congress, providing that the Secretary of War may sell them the land and given them title, and then pay the money into court and let the courts adjudicate the question to whom the money shall be paid, so that the litigation will be concerning the money and not concerning the land.

Mr. FOSTER. More than that, I understand the rental that comes to the Government is to be deducted from the $70,000.

Mr. CARLIN. Only in the event that the Government establishes its title.

Mr. FOSTER. So that they would buy it for $70,000, less the amount paid for rental?

Mr. CARLIN. In the event that the Government establishes its ownership of the land. If the Government loses out, the Government does not get anything. This is a suit between the riparian owners and the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me a bad policy to sell this land.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Virginia understands, of course, that the whereases which precede this bill would not become a part of the law.

Mr. CARLIN. I understand that.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman's attention been called to the fact that with the whereases separated from the bill, the bill would be hardly understandable?

Mr. CARLIN. This is in the form suggested by the War Department, which practically drew the bill. I understand there is an amendment to be offered by some on that side striking out the whereases, which would be perfectly acceptable.

Mr. MONDELL. But in that event I doubt if anyone could interpret or carry out the act.

Mr. CARLIN. I think it would be better to leave them in. In other words, the whole contract is set out in the bill so that Congress may understand it.

Mr. MONDELL. It would be very easy to redraft the bill so as to make reference to the contract in such a way as would identify it; but as the act stands, the enacting portion of it with the whereasas left out would not be understandable.

Mr. CARLIN. Oh, yes; it would, if you strike out only a portion of the whereases. The whereases simply recite the contract. That was done so that Congress might have before it every line and letter of the contract.

Mr. MONDELL. I suggest to the gentleman that he redraft his bill.

Mr. CARLIN. This is the form suggested by the War Department.

Mr. MONDELL. I suggest to the gentleman that he redraft the bill so that without the whereases it would be clear and definite.

Mr. CARLIN. The only effect of redrafting would be to shorten the bill. It is longer by this process, but it was lengthened so that we might know what the contract was. If that was not recited in the bill you could say that nobody knows what the contract is and nobody knows anything about it. It was put in the bill so that you could know all about it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that if the preamble should be stricken out the law enacted would read in this way:

That whenever the title to the whole of said reclaimed area—

"Said" refers to something preceding that language. If the preamble is stricken out there will be nothing in the language preceding it, and therefore "said" will refer to nothing.

Mr. CARLIN. That is correct, unless you insert something in its stead.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Before I make the objection, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the Government of the United States has already relinquished very much more of its title to the water front in the United States than it ought ever to have relinquished. State after State is now being compelled, in order to get justice at the hands of transportation companies—steamboat and even railroad companies—to buy land at terminals at enormous prices, whereas if they had always retained the title and leased the land on suitable terms the transportation facilities of this country would have been greatly enhanced and improved. Here it is proposed to rent property for $4,200 a year, which would aggregate in five years $21,000, and then when the five years are up sell the same land for $70,000. No legislation of such importance as this should come up on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and I object.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will withhold it, but I am going to renew it.

Mr. CARLIN. I have no objection to that, but I want to reply to what the gentleman has said. In the first place, if the gentleman will take time to figure he will find that the rental value of $4,200 is exactly 6 per cent on the purchase price of $70,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then that is good property for the Government to keep.

Mr. CARLIN. But the gentleman does not understand; the Government has not yet acquired the title.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But you seem to expect that it will.

Mr. CARLIN. The contest will go on between the riparian owners and the Government and the Government may never own it; and yet the gentleman will stop the shipbuilding plant where they will have to spend a million dollars. It may be that the gentleman does not want the Government to build ships.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. After that somewhat insulting speech——

Mr. CARLIN. I did not mean it in that way, and if it is offensive to the gentleman I will withdraw it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have heard of gentlemen like the gentleman from Virginia getting up and making insinuating reflections of that kind when a man was simply interested in protecting the people of the United States from being robbed——

Mr. CARLIN. I have withdrawn the remark.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin (continuing). By asking for great privileges on navigable streams. I do not know whether the gentleman is interested in this iron company or some other company in trying to get under unanimous consent this importat legislation, but I do know that when he undertakes by unanimous consent of this kind to make me withdraw an objection, I notify him that he is pursuing the wrong tactics. That will not affect anybody who has at heart the interests of the country, and who knows what the practical giving away of the water front does and has done, so far as the transportation facilities of this country are concerned. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman withhold it? The gentleman has prevented me from replying to his insinuations.

The SPEAKER. All this is out of order, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

CHEROKEE NATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4699) providing for the payment of certain interest on items 1 and 4 of the judgment of the Court of Claims of May 18, 1905, in favor of the Cherokee Nation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object. I will withhold the objection if the gentleman from Oklahoma wishes to say something.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the payment of interest on items 1 and 4 of a judgment entered by the Court of Claims and afterwards affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1906. It is contended by the Cherokee Nation that an error was made in the calculation of the interest on two of the four items. It is contended that there was a mistake in the calculation of the interest on items 1 and 4 of the judgment. Now, this bill has been referred to the Interior Department and has been referred to the Comptroller of the Treasury, and by reference to the report, as shown on pages 4 and 5, it will be seen that the Comptroller of the Treasury recommended it and the Department of the Interior recommended it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says in his closing statement that the Department of the Interior recommended this legislation, and yet I find in a letter from the Secretary of the Interior a strong protest to allowing this fund to go to an attorney, who seemingly is more interested in this issue than the Cherokee Nation. He strongly objects to the language of the proviso as incorporated on page 3, which provides for the payment of these funds to this attorney by name of Boudinot, if I remember correctly. I have no objection, and I do not believe the House would have any objection to the payment of interest on this fund, which was virtually a trust fund that failed to be placed to the trust fund of the Cherokee Nation because of some oversight of bookkeeping in the department. There is a question whether we should in this bill give interest for 10 years on another item which is ascribed to have been the result of a clerical error of the Court of Claims.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the comptroller states that, and the department concedes it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The comptroller does not state it positively. He states that it may have been the result of a clerical error. In the bill following on the Unanimous-Consent Calendar it is purposed to refer certain interest claims that have already been passed upon by the Court of Claims for reinvestigation by the Court of Claims of items 2 and 3, and I can not see any reason—though I think that bill is much more objectionable than this one—why you should not incorporate in that bill the finding by the Court of Claims as to that interest which is claimed to have been overlooked by reason of clerical error.

Mr. HASTINGS. The only difference is that the department has already conceded that the interest is due on items 1 and 4. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I grant that, and I have no objection to the payment of that interest, but the department, if the gentleman will bear with me, does most strenuously object to having this money turned over to a claim agent who has a contract that will not expire until 1920 for the payment of this fund.

Mr. COX. What is his per cent?

Mr. STAFFORD. Fifteen per cent of the amount recovered under that contract.

Mr. HASTINGS. And that was the amount of fee given on the original judgment, but if that would overcome the gentleman's objection to the bill, I shall be very glad to have him make a motion or make a motion myself to strike out the objectionable proviso to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think we should have some further assurance than that.

Mr. HASTINGS. I say that I shall make the motion myself.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think we should have an assurance from the gentlemen who will be conferees on the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, I could not say anything about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have a bill coming into this House with a provision that is strongly opposed by the Secretary of the Interior. The bill may leave this Chamber and go to another body where that same objectionable provision may be incorporated, and still the wishes of the Secretary of the Interior may be thwarted by the agreement in conference. Until I can have some assurance from the chairman of the committee or others who may be conferees that that objectionable feature will not be assented to, I shall feel constrained to object.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me say to the gentleman that with the elimination of this proviso, then, it would leave this bill, as I recall it, in the verbatim language as reported upon by the department, and they concede that the interest is due on items 1 and 4.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. And that this legislation ought to be enacted. I have done all that I possibly could do. I have assured the gentleman that so far as I am concerned I shall make a motion to strike out the proviso and pass it in the form the department recommends, which is conceded by all is due the Cherokee Nation. Let me say one word more. There is not an officer living of the Cherokee Nation to-day. Every dollar of their money except this has been provided to be paid out. The principal chief of the Cherokee Nation who made this contract with this attorney, as shown in the report, died in November last. There are no executive officers left of the Cherokee Nation. We are trying to wind up their affairs. It is the biggest tribe in point of numbers of the Five Civilized Tribes, and, as I recall, the biggest tribe of Indians in America. They have completed the making of their roll, they have allotted their lands, and their affairs are practically all wound up. We have one or two pieces of legislation that I am endeavoring to get Congress to enact so that their affairs will be completely and finally settled up. I can not give the gentleman any assurance of what another body will do, but I do say to the gentleman in good faith, in order that this might be wound up, in order that this attorney might apply elsewhere, wherever he can—and, of course, that is open to him—I shall make the motion to strike out this objectionable proviso, although I do not agree with the gentleman that it is objectionable or unjust. He has a contract with the principal chief of the Cherokee Nation. I do agree with the gentleman that that proviso as to the manner of its being receipted for is objected to by the department, but there is no objection to the payment of the interest, and there is no objection to any other provision of the bill. It is conceded by all that this interest is due.

Mr. STAFFORD. I see the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma], and I would like to ask him, if he has no objection, what his attitude will be?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, without reference to what my position might be, I always consider it my duty if I happen to be a member of a conference committee to carry out the will of the House to the letter, and I have always attempted so to do.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has that record in this House, and I know that no one will question it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I am somewhat inclined to agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not at this moment before me the recommendation of the Secretary so as to say whether the bill with the proviso stricken out would leave the bill in the form so that the money will be paid over to the Cherokee Nation, as suggested by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is no question but what it would be.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection to having the bill passed over without prejudice so as to take it up two weeks hence?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. FOSTER. To go to the foot of the list.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. FOSTER. And go to the foot of the list.

The SPEAKER. And go to the foot of the docket. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HOWARD was granted leave of absence for to-day, on account of serious illness in his family.

CERTAIN CLAIMS OF THE CHEROKEE NATION AGAINST UNITED STATES.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 357) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, consider, and determine certain claims of the Cherokee Nation against the United States.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request with reference to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it goes over without prejudice, and goes to the foot of the calendar.

TWO ADDITIONAL JUSTICES, SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2489) to create two additonal associate justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this bill creating two new judges in the District of Columbia?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice, and let it go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice and go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this place to insert in the RECORD a statement furnished me by the clerk of this court, showing the volume of business which they have done down there in the law department for the last 15 years, and I respectfully ask the Members of the House to read it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the printed communication from the clerk of the court stating the quantity and quality of the business transacted by this court in the last 15 years——

Mr. COX. And that it go in the RECORD as this place.

The SPEAKER. And that it go into the RECORD at this particular place. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INCREASE OF LIMIT OF COST OF PUBLIC BUILDING AT MOULTRIE, GA.

The next bill in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7223) to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Moultrie, in the State of Georgia.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, a few moments ago there were a couple of bills called from the Public Lands Committee, and each one of them was objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Another distinguished Member of the House said that he objected to the Unanimous Consent Calendar being used by the Public Lands Committee as a clearing house for its measures. Now, I want to say to the House that, generally and practically speaking, the only way that the western Members can secure imperative and pressing relief for the protection of public-land settlers and absolutely necessary legislation for the development of the Western States is by using the Unanimous Consent Calendar; and, in the main, the House has been very fair and liberal in its recognition of our necessary use of that calendar. But I do feel, as a western Member, when the statement is made here on the floor of the House and the statement is made that the Public Lands Committee is improperly using the Unanimous Consent Calendar as a clearing house, and that it will not be hereafter permitted, or words to that effect, that if there is to be hereafter a discrimination made on this floor against that committee, that I ought to and must resent it, and that if that is going to be carried out I ought to make the same discrimination against all other committees. No other committee has any more right to or as much need of that calendar as the Public Lands Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman if he is talking about this bill that has been called up?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am reserving the right to object to this bill; yes, sir; and I expect to object to it, and to others.

Mr RUCKER. I hope the gentleman will not do that until he hears from us

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If this House is going to take that unjust position here against my committee——

Mr. WEBB. The House has not done any such thing, but an individual Member.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It looks to me like a plain and announced discrimination against the Public Lands Committee, and I feel it is time we ascertained here now what committees are going to be penalized and what are not. There are 33 bills on this Unanimous Consent Calendar for consideration to-day, and only 4 of them came from the Public Lands Committee, and all 4 of them are so plain and fair and eminently just that they ought to pass without any objection, and yet two of them are already objected off.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I object.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say a word. It is evident the gentleman from Colorado had me in mind because of a statement which I made a few moments ago, but which, unfortunately, he has not accurately quoted. I said then, and I say now, I do not think the Public Lands Committee ought to use the Unanimous Consent Calendar as a clearing house for that character of legislation which is not of a local and private nature. The Unanimous Consent Calendar was not created for the purpose of affording an easy medium for the consideration of bills of a general nature. It was created for the purpose of considering in an easy method bills which were local or private and to which no general policy attached. Now, no one more than the gentleman from Colorado ought to know that there has never been in this House a discrimination against the West as such.

And no man ought to know better than the gentleman from Colorado that no Member of this House has ever shown less disposition to discriminate against any section or against any committee than myself. In the doing of things on this floor many of them are not personally pleasant, but they have always been done simply from a sense of public obligation. The Committee on the Public Lands will receive, I am sure, at the hands of the House that same treatment that the other committees do. If there has been any discrimination, men could say it was in favor of that committee, because most of us realize some of the pressure on Members from a new country. But the West in point of legislation and of time and of consideration on the floor has had more than any other section of the country. Now, I do not say that against it. I state what are simply the plain facts, known to every man here.

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. RUCKER rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri a moment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming, if the gentleman from Missouri will——

Mr. RUCKER. I am trying to talk, but the gentleman from Colorado is all the time trying to talk, begging the gentleman's pardon.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not yield time.

Mr. RUCKER. So far as I am concerned, if the gentleman wants to be discourteous to one of his colleagues, I do not care. He may go ahead and be discourteous, but you will not pass much legislation by unanimous consent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not intend to be discourteous.

The SPEAKER. Both gentlemen are out of order. The question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. RUCKER. I demand the regular order. Make your objection, if you want to object

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects, and that is the end of it. And the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, what gentleman from Massachusetts objected?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH.

Mr. WALSH. No; I did not.

The SPEAKER. Did not the gentleman from Massachusetts call for the regular order?

Mr. RUCKER. I called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

The Clerk will report the next bill.

TO AMEND SECTION 4067 OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9504) to amend section 4067 of the Revised Statutes by extending the scope to include women.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. RUCKER. Reserving the right to object, is it in order to strike out the last word in order to get a minute or two?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman has the right to reserve the right to object.

Mr. WEBB. I will be glad to explain the features of the bill.

Mr. RUCKER. Wait a minute.

Mr. Speaker, the bill I desired to have the House consider a moment ago is one that presents much merit in my opinion. This Congress appropriated money to erect a building upon a site bought by it in the State of Georgia. The authorizations for the site and the building are in the same act—so much for the site and so much for the building. The building was contracted for. After the building was well up and practically complete, as it is to-day, other Government activities were established in this town, and the Secretary of the Treasury says it is absolutely necessary to provide housing for these activities by enlarging the building now under construction or the Government will have to erect a new building or rent a building. The Secretary reported that it would require a very small additional sum to add an additional story while the house is in process of construction. In the absence of the chairman and the gentleman who introduced the bill I felt justified in saying this much. The bill ought to pass. But by reason of the fact that some gentleman suggested, and perhaps very wisely suggested, that this calendar should not be made a clearing house for the disposal of the public domain, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is objecting to everything. He will make haste slowly if he continues such tactics. I want to say that much for his benefit.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON and Mr. MONDELL rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is recognized.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that the bill that has just come up from the Committee on the Judiciary is a very good answer to the position which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has taken. As I understood his statement, it was this: That no bills coming from any committee, not only the Committee on the Public Lands but from any committee, because he stated it was not his purpose to discriminate between committees, that no bill coming from any committee that was of a general nature ought to come up on this Calendar for Unanimous Consent. And if the position is sound and correct the gentleman from Kentucky ought to be on his feet now to object to this present bill. I do not anticipate that he will so object. I hope that no one will object, because this is a bill to which probably no one in the House has any objection. It is a bill of importance, and there is no good prospect that it can be reached at any time soon or in any other way except on this calendar. I was not here when the House adopted the rule for the Unanimous Consent Calendar, but it seems to me ridiculous to say now that it shall have such a limited scope that a bill of general purpose that everyone wants to see passed must fail of passage because the Unanimous Consent Calendar was not created to take care of it. This is a bill to make the present statute as to spies and aliens applicable to women as well as to men. It ought to be enacted on the call of this calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. In a minute. If that bill, to which no one has objection, should be passed to-day, a bill from the Public Lands Committee of a general nature, and to which no one has objection, likewise should be passed.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that no private bill could go on this calendar—no private claim could come on this calendar? They are absolutely forbidden.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman will admit there are bills of more or less local application——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Private claims can not be considered.

Mr. CRAMTON. No; private claims can not be considered, but the bill just stricken off was, of course, a bill of local interest. I think that is the distinction that the gentleman from Kentucky wanted to make.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me a moment, I do not want unduly to detain it, but the proposition is not simply that no matter of a general nature should ever be considered by unanimous consent. No one ever so stated; but, speaking by and large, the Unanimous Consent Calendar should not be the medium for the consideration of matters of complicated legislation affecting general policies.

Now, everyone knows that public-land legislation is very involved. There are a great many public-land laws that only a very limited number of men in this House are familiar with. I submit in all candor—and I submit it not as a critic, but as one friendly to the West—that gentlemen from that section ought not to ask of the House constant consideration on the Unanimous Consent Calendar of bills involving detailed consideration of public-land laws, either from the Committee on Public Lands or any other committee.

Now, I do not claim infallibility. I have made objections when I felt it my duty to make them, and I shall do it in the future, undeterred by the scoldings of anybody or the threats of anybody. All I can say is that, as a general rule, this calendar should not be used to deal with matters of a general nature.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the distinction the gentleman now makes is a much different one, and one on which we can better agree, that a bill of a complicated and involved nature should not be considered, not that any bill of a general nature should not be considered.

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think the difficulty in regard to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] grew out of the fact of a misunderstanding of its nature, character, and scope. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] very properly, I think, suggested that general legislation of a very complicated nature, difficult of understanding by those not familiar with the subject matter, should not be taken up and disposed of by unanimous consent. This is not that kind of a bill. It is an exceedingly simple bill, and it is quite limited in its application.

Under the Carey Act, which is a law authorizing the States under certain conditions to reclaim desert lands, the States have in certain instances attempted to do that; in some cases the attempts have not been successful. Settlers, however, had gone upon the land, expecting to have it reclaimed. Now, it so happens that the Interior Department holds that in a case of that kind the settler who has gone upon the land, without regard to the length of his residence there or the character or value of the improvements, does not have the preferential right of entry under the homestead law which the same citizen would have had he settled anywhere else on the public domain except on public lands within the Carey Act.

My own opinion is that the department should not so hold, but it does. Those men are clearly settlers upon the public domain, in good faith, for the purpose of making and securing a home, and this bill only grants such persons a preference right to make a homestead entry on the lands which they have settled upon under the Carey Act. It is very limited in its effect. It is very conservative in its provisions. It is too conservative, as a matter of fact, and it will only help in comparatively few cases. It should give a preference right without regard to homestead qualification.

I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] will withdraw his objection, because none of the suggestions that he has made as to the class of legislation that should not be considered under unanimous consent applies to this bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I object.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. I want to state, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is recommended by the President of the United States as a war emergency bill. It was so recommended last December in his annual message, and it was recommended by the Attorney General, and it is very urgent legislation, because it enables the Government to take care of female alien enemies as well as male enemies. The present statute—Four thousand and sixty-seventh Revised Statutes—is confined to persons being males over 14 years of age. We strike out the word "males" and make the statute include women among the alien enemies of the country. If the gentleman wants to object to this kind of important matter to our country he is at perfect liberty to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4067 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4067. Whenever there is declared a war between the United States and any foreign nation or government, or any invasion or predatory incursion is perpetrated, attempted, or threatened against the territory of the United States by any foreign nation or government, and the President makes public proclamation of the event, all natives, citizens, denizens, or subjects of the hostile nation or government, being of the age of 14 years and upward, who shall be within the United States and not actually naturalized, shall be liable to be apprehended, restrained, secured, and removed as alien enemies. The President is authorized, in any such event, by his proclamation thereof, or other public act, to direct the conduct to be observed, on the part of the United States, toward the aliens who become so liable; the manner and degree of the restraint to which they shall be subject and in what cases, and upon what security their residence shall be permitted, and to provide for the removal of those who, not being permitted to reside within the United States, refuse or neglect to depart therefrom; and to establish any other regulations which are found necessary in the premises and for the public safety."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. While the bill as reported is in exactly the same language as the existing law, with the exception of eliminating the word "male," I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the language in the first line of the section is not rather awkward—"Whenever there is declared a war"?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, it is awkward; but that is the way we find it in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but while we are amending the law, why not use proper language—"Whenever a war is declared"?

Mr. WEBB. I agree with the gentleman entirely; but we believed we would not trouble the language of the statute, which is hoary with age, passed in 1791.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, if the Committee on the Judiciary is wedded to the cobwebs of the past and to the language of a century ago, I am not going to interpose any suggestion of a change in making the language modern, and therefore I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBB, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FREE SURVEY OF HOMESTEAD IN ALASKA.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8563) to amend the homestead law in its application to Alaska, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to extend a certain measure of assistance and relief to certain deserving and worthy homesteaders in the Territory of Alaska by extending to them the privilege of free surveys of their homesteads where the public land surveys have not been extended over them.

The legislation here contemplated has been recommended by various officials of the Government for a number of years. It has the approval of——

Mr. MADDEN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know what the gentleman is asking permission to do?

Mr. SULZER. I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has not yet got consent to consider the bill at all.

The SPEAKER. No. The Chair supposed that the gentleman thought it necessary to make a preliminary statement.

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. Reserving the right to object, we want to find out something about it.

Mr. FERRIS. Let the gentleman explain the bill. I think there will be no objection to it. It is a very inoffensive little bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Even though it comes from the Committee on the Public Lands. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER. Even if it does come from the Committee on the Public Lands, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is purely of a local character, and applies only to certain homesteaders in the Territory of Alaska. As I was about to state, it has the approval and recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, and the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on the Public Lands. The area of surveyed land in the Territory of Alaska is to the total area of that Territory as the area of one-half of the State of Maryland is to the total area of the United States. Undoubtedly it will be many years before the public-land surveys can be extended all over Alaska, whereas there are certain homesteads being located in various parts of the Territory wherever development is taking place and wherever markets are afforded. This bill is to provide relief for these homesteaders, who will not come under the public-land surveys without it. It is designed to extend to them the free public surveys upon application and proper showing that they have complied with the various requirements of the homestead laws.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Does this bill modify the present law, or enact new law in any way, except in its provisions for a free survey?

Mr. SULZER. That is all. It simply modifies the present law by adding a section, which is section 2 of this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Do you modify section 1 at all?

Mr. SULZER. No, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, why is section 1 set out?

Mr. SULZER. It is simply a repetition.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is quite certain that there is no change in section 1 of the existing law?

Mr. SULZER. I will read from the report of the Secretary of the Interior, in which he says:

This bill amends the act of July 8, 1916 (39 Stat., 352), by the addition of a new section, which will be numbered section 2, providing that if the system of public surveys has not been extended over the land included in a homestead entry, the entryman may, after compliance with the terms of the homestead law, submit proof thereof to the register and receiver, who thereupon, if satisfied with the showing, will so advise the surveyor general of the Territory, this officer to then take the necessary steps for the survey of the homestead at the expense of the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. But does the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, that section 1 as set out in the bill is section 1 of the present law, which is sought to be amended by the addition of a section?

Mr. SULZER. This was copied from the present law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the framer of the bill, instead of drafting it so as to provide for an additional section which is included in section 2, framed it in this form because section 3 is part of the existing law, which is now section 2, and therefore the drafters of the bill wished to have the whole law presented for consideration in one measure?

Mr. SULZER. I will state to the gentleman that the bill was drafted by the Interior Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Still reserving the right to object, I have been trying to read this report and listen to the gentleman at the same time, but I have missed a good deal of what the gentleman stated. I would be obliged to the gentleman if he would repeat what he has already said so that I may know what the single effect of this bill is.

Mr. SULZER. I will state to the gentleman that there is a very small area of the public land of Alaska that has been surveyed.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand that.

Mr. SULZER. There are certain areas that probably will not be surveyed for a great many years, for instance, along the coast. It is a very mountainous country but there are certain small areas at the mouths of streams, or in pockets in the mountains, that are suitable for homesteading, and where homesteads have been located, and it is designed to enable these people to have the same privilege as those who come under the public-land surveys; that is, that the Surveyor General can authorize a survey of their homesteads free upon application and proper showing to be made that they have complied with the homestead laws. That can be done very much more cheaply than the individual homesteader can have his homestead surveyed, because it can be done in groups.

Mr. SHERLEY. What you mean is to take the expense off the back of the homesteader and put it on the Government.

Mr. SULZER. That is it precisely.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why?

Mr. SULZER. Because they are a very deserving class of people.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand; and the Government is occasionally deserving, and is at present struggling under very difficult circumstances to get money enough to keep itself from going bankrupt.

Mr. SULZER. This will involve a very small expense to the Government; as a matter of fact it will not make any more expense to the Government because when the homesteader has his homestead surveyed the Government has to go and check that up and that means a resurvey, and the work under the present conditions is done twice which puts the homesteaders to great expense unnecessarily.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you require the Government to survey this land?

Mr. SULZER. It is at the Government's discretion upon the application of the homesteader who is required to make a proper showing.

Mr. SHERLEY. You propose to let the homesteader go on the land and establish a homestead right prior to a survey being made.

Mr. FERRIS. That always has been permitted in the States.

Mr. SHERLEY. It depends upon what you mean by "right." He may establish a claim but not establish a right.

Mr. JUUL. There could not be any settlement on the land without a survey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to delay the House, but I can not determine these matters offhand.

Mr. MADDEN. In order to expedite matters, Mr. Speaker, I object. I do not think the Government ought to be compelled to pay the expenses of these surveys.

EXCLUSION OF SUBJECTS OF AUSTRIA-HUNGARY AND GERMANY FROM ALIEN ENEMY ACT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9159) to authorize the President of the United States to exclude certain subjects of Austria-Hungary and Germany from the classification of alien enemies and to naturalize certain members of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is a most important bill. It is rather involved in some of its provisions and would require some time to consider it. If it is considered I hope the gentleman from Virginia will be rather liberal in the time allowed for its consideration.

Mr. FLOOD. I have no objection to any reasonable debate on the bill. It is an important measure. The most important features of the bill are those which authorize the naturalization of men in our Army, Navy, and Marine Corps who are subjects of our enemies.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have had difficulty—I may be obtuse—in ascertaining the purpose of the committee in the phraseology of the last paragraph of section 2, found on page 3. It is as follows:

And except as hereinafter specified in this act, the method herein provided for acquiring citizenship shall apply to all aliens hereinbefore described, whether or not they are natives, citizens, subjects, or denizens of a country, State, or sovereignty with which the United States is at war: Provided, That they are not otherwise ineligible to become citizens of the United States under the naturalization laws now in force.

My specific question is as to whom that phraseology pertains—that "the method herein provided for acquiring citizenship shall apply to all aliens hereinbefore described." Is it limited merely to the men of alien birth who are serving in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, or is it more general in its scope and extends to the class of aliens enumerated in the first section of the bill?

Mr. FLOOD. It only extends to aliens serving in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the language expressly states otherwise. You have already in prior language authorized aliens serving in the Army and Navy to avail themselves of citizenship by applying to the district court and showing that they have been residents of the United States one year, and now you go on in this general language and provide:

And, except as hereinafter specified in this act, the method herein provided for acquiring citizenship shall apply—to all aliens hereinbefore described.

They are found in the first section. They are:

Alsatians, Bohemians, Croatians, Hungarians, Italians, Jews, Lithuanians, Loranians, Moravians, Poles, Roumanians, Ruthenians, Serbs, Slovaks, Slovenes, and other natives, subjects or denizens of Austria-Hungary or Germany, or any individual or class thereof from the classification of alien enemies, wherever such classification now exists by reason of any act of Congress of the United States.

Why does not the general language to which I have directly referred relate to aliens hereinbefore described in section 1?

Mr. FLOOD. The intention of the committee was to restrict that to the aliens described in section 2.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that was the intention of the committee, what is the necessity of making any reference whatever to them in the language referred to in the last paragraph? They have already been taken care of by the direct provision in section 2.

Mr. SABATH. If I may be permitted, I may be able to explain this provision to the gentleman from Wisconsin. It has reference to those who can not under present naturalization laws be naturalized, namely, the Japanese and such other people. That is what was intended. As to the first section, I wish to say to the gentleman that it has been agreed on the part of the chairman of the committee to strike out the first section, and then we will have only section 2; so that the objection that the gentleman from Wisconsin has raised to that wording will not apply, because section 1, as I understand, will go out.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I think I can explain to the satisfaction of my colleague from Wisconsin the provision he is discussing. The language is:

And except as hereinafter specified in this act the method herein provided for acquiring citizenship shall apply to all aliens hereinbefore described, whether or not they are natives, citizens, subjects, or denizens of a country, State, or sovereignty with which the United States is at war: Provided, That they are not otherwise ineligible to become citizens of the United States under the naturalization laws now in force.

My colleague will observe in lines 5 and 6 the provision is that it shall apply to all aliens, whether they are citizens of a country with which we are now at war or not. The first part of the bill applies to aliens who are citizens of a country with which the United States is at war, but there may be aliens in our Army who are citizens of a neutral country. For instance, they might be citizens of Holland, of Norway, of Sweden, of Spain, of Brazil, or any other country in South America or Central America. That language would cover them, because they would be citizens of a country with which the United States is not at war; but, Mr. Speaker, recurring to the first part of that clause, "and except as hereinafter specified in this act," and coming down to section 3 we find this language:

That application for naturalization in the mode herein provided shall not be open to natives, citizens, subjects, or denizens of Austria-Hungary or Germany, except such individuals and classes as may be exempted by the President under the provisions of section 1 of this act.

The first class to which my colleague referred covers all aliens who are citizens of a country with which we are at war who are in our Army, and also aliens who are citizens of neutral countries who are in our armies, and the next section excludes those who can not be naturalized.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] there may be something in the suggestion he makes. I think probably there is. If it is an error, I think that it grew out of the fact that this bill was largely amended after it was introduced. Section 2 was taken from one bill and section 1 was taken from another bill. I have been requested by the Department of Justice, for very good reasons, to strike out the first and third sections. If that is done, the gentleman will see that the language to which he called attention is very proper in the bill with reference to section 2 and the rest of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Sections 3 and 1 will go out?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will agree that if section 1 should remain the general language in section 2 would apply to all those aliens referred to in section 1.

Mr. FLOOD. It would seem so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can readily understand the error the committee got into by reason of framing this composite bill from different measures. Of course, if it is the purpose to strike out section 1 everything in section 2 will be intelligible.

Mr. MADDEN. And section 3 will have to go out also.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. How does the gentleman contend that this bill comes within the rule laid down in section 8 of the Constitution requiring uniform rules of naturalization to be provided throughout the United States?

Mr. FLOOD. This is uniform. This applies only to men who are in war and men who have rendered special services. It has been held that such legislation does not violate the provision requiring uniformity.

Mr. WALSH. It is not uniform with those not in the war. It gives a certain class certain privileges with reference to naturalization.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But the rule of uniformity has reference to the laws of the various States of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. I submit it does not do anything of the kind. Under the Supreme Court decisions you can not set up certain classes and say that gentlemen from England can come in here and be naturalized under certain conditions, and that gentlemen from Italy can come in and be naturalized under certain other conditions.

Mr. MILLER of Minesota. That is not what we say.

Mr. WALSH. But you are setting up classes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Oh, no; we simply say that any man who serves in the armies of the United States under certain conditions may be naturalized.

Mr. DYER. As he ought to be.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. As he ought to be.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOSTER). Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a very important measure and should be carefully considered. These sections 1 and 3 are to be stricken out. I think it is due to the House that it has an opportunity to consider the measure, and I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that he pass the matter over until we reach the close of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent and take it up at that time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman will not insist upon that.

Mr. DYER. I hope the gentleman will not ask that.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes. This is an important measure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I simply suggest that the bill be passed over until the Calendar for Unanimous Consent has been concluded, and that we take it up then as the last bill on the calendar to-day.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman that it is an important measure. It involves the well-being if not the retaining in our armies of probably 75,000 splendid soldiers and drawing to our standard many others whom we are in duty bound to protect as far as we can when they go abroad and meet the soldiers of the Governments to which they owe some sort of allegiance now. I am willing to accept the gentleman's suggestion if we can——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We can let the bill go over until the calendar is completed and then take it up.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up at 4 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think that is a very bad practice, and I shall have to object to setting any definite time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman know whether or not there is now in force an order issued by the Secretary of War to the effect that no native of Germany or of any of the territory within the German Empire, though he may now be a citizen of the United States, shall be given a commission in the Army?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not.

Mr. MONDELL. Unless I am very much mistaken, there is such an order; and if there is an order of that sort, how much good does section 2 do the Government, anyway? I have a constituent, born in Schleswig-Holstein of Danish parents, who came to America as a very young child, served 12 years in the Regular Army, a fine soldier, who has passed several examinations and stood high, and was refused a commission on the ground of an order issued by the Secretary of War to the effect that no native of any of the territory within the German Empire or Austria-Hungary, I presume, may receive a commission. Now, that is the word I received directly from the War Department, as I understand it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How recently is that order supposed to be issued?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know; but I do know this young man—very capable, very efficient, very anxious to serve his Government—was refused a commission after having passed a number of examinations splendidly and having all sorts of favorable recommendations from people who have known him for years because, as he understands it, he was born in Germany, though of Danish parents.

Mr. FLOOD. It must be a recent order.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There must be a mistake——

Mr. FLOOD. I know of cases where they have gotten commissions.

Mr. MONDELL. That must have occurred, I assume, or this legislation would not be here.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to considering this measure, but I do object to having it considered in this manner, and I therefore ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOSTER). The regular order is, is there objection to this bill. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9159) to authorize the President of the United States to exclude certain subjects of Austria-Hungary and Germany from the classification of alien enemies and to naturalize certain members of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered by proclamation or otherwise to exclude Alsatians, Bohemians, Croatians, Hungarians, Italians, Jews, Lithuanians, Loranians, Moravians, Poles, Roumanians, Ruthenians, Serbs, Slovaks, Slovenes, and other natives, subjects, or denizens of Austria-Hungary or Germany, or any individual or class thereof from the classification of alien enemies, wherever such classification now exists by reason of any act of Congress of the United States: Provided, however, That such exclusion shall not apply to any individual who claims exemption from the military service of the United States under the selective-draft act of May 18, 1917, on the ground of alienage.

SEC. 2. That during the present war any alien now or hereafter in the service of the United States as a member of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who has an honorable record in such service, may, while in such service be admitted to become a citizen of the United States upon his petition filed in any district court of the United States, the United States district courts for the Terriories of Hawaii or Alaska, the United States district court for Porto Rico, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or a court of record of any of the States having a common-law jurisdiction and a seal and a clerk, whether or not any such alien be a resident of the State, Territory, or District in which the application is made; the court before admitting such alien to citizenship shall require oral or documentary proofs, by witnesses under oath or by affidavits, that he is of good moral character and loyal to the United States, but shall not require him to prove more than one year's residence in the United States previous to filing such petition, and shall also require him to make the oath of allegiance to the United States as now prescribed under the law relating to naturalization. And except as hereinafter specified in this act, the method herein provided for acquiring citizenship shall apply to all aliens hereinbefore described, whether or not they are natives, citizens, subjects, or denizens of a country, State, or sovereignty with which the United States is at war: Provided, That they are not otherwise ineligible to become citizens of the United States under the naturalization laws now in force.

SEC. 3. That application for naturalization in the mode herein provided shall not be open to natives, citizens, subjects, or denizens of Austria-Hungary or Germany, except such individuals and classes as may be exempted by the President under the provisions of section 1 of this act.

SEC. 4. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to make and promulgate such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, whether or not such regulations conform to the procedure now existing.

SEC. 5. That certificates of citizenship obtained in the mode provided in this act shall be subject to cancellation in any district court of the United States upon proof that the person so naturalized has been guilty of mutiny, sedition, desertion, or of committing a felony against the criminal laws of the United States, or of committing a crime which, according to the laws of the place where it was committed, is punishable by death or imprisonment for a term exceeding one year in a penitentiary, or that he has been dishonorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States. The procedure in the district court of the United States for such cancellation shall follow the procedure described in the act of June 29, 1906 (ch. 3592, sec. 15), and shall be in addition to modes of cancellation and of expatriation provided by all statutes now in force.

SEC. 6. That the provisions of this act shall remain in force and effect during the continuance of the present war, and all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby suspended during the continuance of the present war.

During the reading of the bill,

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to go back a little, and I want to move to strike out——

Mr. WALSH. The bill has not been read yet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is being read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a House bill, and at the conclusion of the reading of the bill the gentleman from Virginia has a right to offer an amendment or to move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded with and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman to explain just why it is necessary to strike out that first section.

Mr. FLOOD. I am making this motion, Mr. Speaker, in deference to a request of the Attorney General, supplemented by a request of the State Department. The reasons given for wanting this section stricken out were that there was no necessity now for it, the liberal terms of the proclamation of the President in reference to subjects of Austria-Hungary satisfying those most interested in this section that the President by his proclamation could serve the same purpose as the enactment of this law. Then, the Department of Justice feared that if the President should exclude any one of the races named in the bill from the classification of alien enemies he would automatically lose power to intern dangerous members of that particular race, and evildoers or dangerous persons of that particular race could therefore be reached only by the ordinary course of judicial process. Exemption by him of one of these races would result also in releasing from the war prison camps any members of that particular race who have already been interned.

Again, to confer upon the President this discretion would make him the center of a strong agitation on the part of members of each of the races mentioned in the bill, requesting that he exempt members of that particular race from the classification of alien enemies. This fact would foment great discontent, particularly if he should, after consideration, exempt part of the races and not the rest.

The chief object of this measure is to protect the members of the different classes or races who have volunteered or have been willingly drafted into our Army. There are quite a number of them. Gen. Crowder stated before the committee when we were considering this bill that there were nearly 11,000 subjects of Austria-Hungary alone—Bohemians, Slovaks, Slovenes, Italians, and others—who have been drafted into the Army and many thousands who have volunteered to go into the Army. There are probably 75,000 subjects of Austria-Hungary and Germany in our Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to-day and who will soon be sent abroad to face the armies of the governments to which they belonged in the past and which still claim their allegiance. These soldiers would be treated, if captured, as traitors and shot as such. The chief desire of those who advocated this measure was to give what protection we could to those people and put us in the position of insisting that the rules of war should be applied to them just as they are to our other soldiers.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am in entire sympathy with the suggestion and the purpose of this matter, but has the gentleman any assurance that the other nations, Germany, for instance, would recognize the citizenship of these people after we had them naturalized and not treat them as deserters, as the gentleman says they would be, and correctly, under existing conditions?

Mr. FLOOD. None in the world. We have no assurance in the world that they would recognize this. I believe Austria-Hungary does not recognize extradition now, but I believe that by the practice of reprisal we could force these countries to recognize this citizenship.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is exactly what I had in mind.

Mr. FLOOD. This is all we can do.

Mr. HAMLIN. And very likely it would not be any protection to these people if we granted it.

Mr. FLOOD. It is all the protection we can give; it is the very best we can do for them, and it may not amount to very much, yet it is the very best protection this Government can give to them, and that is what we are trying to do by this bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Would not it amount really to a great deal? If these men of whom the gentleman speaks are citizens of the United States and are captured by Austria, for instance, and are not treated by her as prisoners of war, citizens of a belligerent country with which Austria is at war, then retaliation is always in order in war.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We have in our possession Austrian soldiers, German soldiers, and we would mete out to them exactly what they meted out to these men, and they would drop it mighty quick. That is the only way to stop the central powers.

Mr. HAMLIN. We should do it even if these boys are not naturalized if they are loyal enough to fight in our Army.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We could not at this time grant anything but naturalization.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am in favor of naturalization; I think they ought to be naturalized. I was asking if the measure was in force would it be any protection to them?

Mr. FLOOD. None, except the question of retaliation and reprisal. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that those are the reasons why the Attorney General requested that the bill be amended.

The reason the Committee on Foreign Affairs was very much wedded to section 1 was on account of the moral effect we thought at that time it would have on the subjects of Austro-Hungary. I do not believe anything we can do now will have any great effect upon those who are not hostile to that Government, at any rate, and the importance of that section does not seem to me as great now as it was a month ago.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. During the consideration of the bill it was my impression that section 1 was looked on as the important section of it.

Mr. FLOOD. I believe it was then. But the important thing now, it seems to me, is to give what protection we can to these 75,000 men who have volunteered to go into our service and take upon themselves the risk that service will entail upon them.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. What do the brilliant legal experts of the State Department, to whom the gentleman referred the other day, think of this measure?

Mr. FLOOD. I can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the gentleman what the brilliant legal experts of the State Department, as he termed them the other day, have to say in reference to this measure?

Mr. FLOOD. They are very much in favor of it.

Mr. WALSH. Where do they say so?

Mr. FLOOD. What?

Mr. WALSH. Where in the report do they say so?

Mr. FLOOD. They do not say so in the report. They said so in the hearings. The Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Polk, appeared at the hearings and so stated, and he subsequently wrote me a letter, which I have here, in which he withdraws his support of section 1, but not to the rest of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. And renews it to the other sections of the bill?

Mr. FLOOD. He withdraws his support only to section 1. Here is the letter:

THE COUNSELOR FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 9, 1918.

The Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. FLOOD: The Attorney General has called my attention to the fact that the bill in Congress, H. R. 9159, which relates in part to the subject of naturalizing alien enemies in the military forces, has a provision in the first section conferring on the President the power to exclude from the present classification of alien enemies some 15 races. This feature, I understand, is opposed by the War Department and the Department of Justice, and this department is in agreement with these other departments.

I am taking the liberty of writing you, as I stated at the hearing before your committee when this bill first came up, that I saw no objection to conferring discretionary powers on the President. This was an off-hand opinion, and I gave it before I had had an opportunity to read the bill. I think I also stated that this was a matter peculiarly within the province of the Attorney General, and the department felt that his views on the subject should control.

With warm regards, yours, sincerely,

FRANK S. POLK.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman answer a question with reference to section 2, which has now, I understand, become section 1? Is it intended to permit these men to file their petitions for naturalization in courts which do not now have jurisdiction over naturalization matters?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. WALSH. It says here:

That upon his petition filed in any district court of the United States or a court of record in any of the States having a common-law jurisdiction and a seal and a clerk.

Now, that would include a great many courts that do not now have naturalization jurisdiction in some States.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to have the gentleman name any court having common-law jurisdiction that is not now having jurisdiction over naturalization cases.

Mr. FLOOD. That section, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], was drawn by a very distinguished Harvard professor of international law——

Mr. WALSH. That is the reason I think we ought to scrutinize it right closely.

Mr. FLOOD. I have not finished. Drawn by this Harvard professor in conjunction with a district attorney of the United States, and in explanation of that language, about which the committee questioned them closely, they stated that they were substantially following the language of the existing statute.

Mr. WALSH. The naturalization law?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will find that any court of to-day having common-law jurisdiction is competent to give naturalization.

Mr. ROGERS. How about the police courts and the district courts of Massachusetts? I think they have common-law jurisdiction?

Mr. WALSH. They have a seal and have a clerk.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No police court in the world has common-law jurisdiction. They may exercise it.

Mr. FLOOD. That was the statement made. The draftsmen of this section undertook to follow, as near as possible, the existing naturalization laws. They only changed it where it was necessary to give these privileges contained in this bill to the men to whom it applied.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, when the bill was originally drawn, as is stated by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], the important section of it was the first section. I think the chairman of the committee—but if he did not, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]—spoke to me about the second section, which is peculiarly within the province and jurisdiction of the Committee on Immigration. And viewing as I did the fact that the first section was the important section, I stated to those gentlemen that, so far as I was concerned, we would make no point on that.

It seems it has progressed to the point where the first section should be stricken out, and the bill having been reported and gone that far, I still would make no objection to it. I think the statement of the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, is correct in regard to the naturalization law, that the language there used in regard to naturalization, as to the courts that may have jurisdiction, is the exact language of the general naturalization law. I examined it when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], who is a member of both our committee and the Committee on Foreign Affairs, called my attention to it, and I felt that it was in proper form for the adjudication of the courts of the country having jurisdiction in this matter, and, so far as I was concerned, I could see no objection to that part of it. And the fact that the main part, or the head, has been stricken out will not cause me to make any objection to the jurisdiction of the committee as to the other part.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will state that when section 2 and the other sections of this bill were being considered I realized the fact that the committee having jurisdiction was the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. I went to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and told him that we were considering this matter, and he generously said that, in view of the importance of it and in view of the fact that we had the whole subject under consideration, he would be glad to have the Foreign Affairs Committee proceed with it and report it. His statement now is the statement he made then.

Mr. BURNETT. Here is the language of the statute:

The courts having a seal, a clerk, and jurisdiction in actions at law or equity, or law and equity, in which the amount in controversy is unlimited.

Mr. SABATH. That is the present law.

Mr. WALSH. I could not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BURNETT. I think this conforms to the present general law.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, may I ask somebody to read that section again? I could not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BURNETT. I read:

That exclusive jurisdiction to naturalize aliens as citizens of the United States is hereby conferred upon the following specified courts: United States circuit and district courts now existing or which may hereafter be established by Congress in any State, United States district courts for the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Hawaii, and Alaska, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts for the Indian Territory; also all courts of record in any State or Territory now existing, or which may hereafter be created, having a seal, a clerk, and jurisdiction in actions at law or equity, or law and equity, in which the amount in controversy is unlimited.

That is the language covering the jurisdiction of the courts under the general law.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And the language in the proposed act is really more restrictive than that?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. We undertook to make it conform to that.

Mr. ROGERS. The suggestion is made that the law may be too narrow. My inquiry is as to whether it is not too narrow in another respect. A great many of our soldiers are going to be abroad in France. They are not going to be able to take advantage of this law in its present form, because this permits them to acquire citizenship only before a court within the territory of the United States. Would the gentleman think it practicable to allow the consul general to France or some other officer of the United States to bestow citizenship on our soldiers while they are in France, while they may be especially anxious to take advantage of it?

Mr. FLOOD. I think this goes far enough. We were informed that the purpose of the War Department was, as soon as this became a law, to get these judges to go into the camps and hold court and facilitate the naturalization in every way. But that was some time ago, probably two months ago, and many of these aliens may now have gone abroad.

Mr. ROGERS. The judges would not go abroad?

Mr. FLOOD. No; they would not go abroad, but would give opportunity to the soldiers in the camps and cantonments here.

Mr. ROGERS. The soldiers will be going abroad every month. Many of them not now are eligible, but they will become eligible later. We recently passed a repatriation statute somewhat analogous to this and applying to men who enlisted in the armies of the allies. They can go before the consular officers in France. Would there be any objection to following that analogy here? I would like the gentleman to answer my question.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It is not likely that any of these soldiers who are not citizens who are now in camp will be sent to a foreign field until this limitation is removed?

Mr. FLOOD. My understanding is that if this bill passes in reasonable time an opportunity will be given to all these soldiers to become citizens before they go abroad. That is, those who will not already have sailed.

Mr. FESS. It is not possible that our Government will send these soldiers abroad until this disability is removed?

Mr. FLOOD. I think most of them will be held here until they have opportunity to be naturalized.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I understand that all of those not naturalized have been returned to the United States. I understand they have been weeded out abroad and have been sent back here.

Mr. FESS. That is to prevent embarrassment. Now, the gentleman will recall that when Paderewski was before our committee his idea of naming these particular classes was that it would be psychological, and it would create a very important situation on the part of those over there under the Government who were still suffering, although their sympathy was with us. That is why it was put in. It was purely psychological.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is not this bill drawn to cover the very persons cited by the gentleman from Ohio? It says a petition may be filed in any district and proved by affidavit. I understand it is broad enough in the provision to permit an alien soldier to file his affidavit, and it would cover the case that has been raised of an absent soldier taking out papers.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the bill does not provide for a soldier to be represented by attorney, does not the gentleman think that that should be done?

Mr. ROBBINS. I think it does provide in line 23 for the very contingency that the gentleman from Kansas suggests.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I thought perhaps it did, but it is not entirely clear. I thought that the court should clearly have jurisdiction to grant citizenship in the absence of a soldier with his company on appearance by attorney.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman does not think that is accomplished by the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is not clear.

Mr. FLOOD. The bill provides that the courts before admitting such alien to citizenship shall require oral or documentary proofs by witnesses under oath or by affidavits to show that he is of good moral character and loyal to the United States, but shall not require him to prove more than one year's residence in the United States previous to filing such petition.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There should be a proviso here that that should be done on the application of the alien, either in person or by attorney.

Mr. FLOOD. Certainly there would be no objection to that.

Mr. TOWNER. In line with what the gentleman from Kansas says, the present law, of course, requires the application to be made and presented in person, and unless there was a specific section in the bill to modify that the courts, I think, would hold that that would still be required.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think it will be necessary. If the gentleman from Virginia, who has the floor, can offer an amendment that will do that, I think it should be done.

Mr. FLOOD. I will do it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think it would be well to consider that very carefully. If the aliens now in the Army of the United States who were in France or abroad anywhere have been, a large proportion of them, already returned to the United States because of their alienage, and the others are to be returned, I think the law then should still be as it is, requiring the applicant himself to appear and be identified, and so forth, before the officer where he makes the application.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I make this observation? Many of these young men are far from the courts having jurisdiction. Some of them are located 1,500 miles from their homes. It would take 15 days' leave.

Mr. FLOOD. That is not intended. The language could not be construed that way.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They do not have to go to the home courts, but to any court?

Mr. FLOOD. It was stated before the committee that the judges could go into those camps and hold court there for naturalization.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit another suggestion?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He can go to a court in the vicinity of the cantonment, and not only that, but he can prove his moral character by affidavits sent from his home?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So that every convenience is afforded to the soldier.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Even though the bill with the consent of the Department of Justice should provide for that, I think the better practice would be for the friends and neighbors of the applicant to appear in court and testify to his right to become a citizen, upon his application by an attorney who knows him, and on his affidavit that might be prepared and sent to him. The applicant may go into a court established in the camp, but he has no one there who knows him. He has no affidavit there. It is more difficult to arrange the details of the application for citizenship in the camp, away from the friends of the soldier, than it would be to have it arranged in the home court, where witnesses and friends know the soldier.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Here is the situation: A great many people in our city have gone to Canada and enlisted in the Canadian Army. They were not taking volunteers in the United States, and these men went over there because they wanted to fight, and they are in the army over there. What becomes of that element, of whom great numbers are over there?

Mr. FLOOD. They are not in our Army.

Mr. GALLAGHER. No; they are in the Canadian Army.

Mr. FLOOD. This would not apply to them, and I do not think it ought to apply to them. Does the gentleman think so?

Mr. GALLAGHER. They are citizens of this country

Mr. FESS. They could not enlist over there without relinquishing their American citizenship.

Mr. BURNETT. This is not a repatriation bill.

Mr. SABATH. I think the gentleman means residents of the United States not citizens.

Mr. GALLAGHER. They resided here and many of them became citizens, and then they went over there and enlisted.

Mr. FLOOD. They would come in under a bill that we passed sometime ago.

Mr. SABATH. And another bill which is pending and liable to be called up at almost any time.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, having the utmost confidence in the loyalty and patriotism of the people of the nationalities described in section 1, I introduced a resolution some time ago exempting them from the operations of the alien-enemy act. Since that time the President of the United States in a proclamation has exempted all of these people and has added other nationalities, exempting them from the operations of the alien-enemy act. That I have been justified in my confidence I offer this fact, that nearly 100,000 aliens of these nationalities are now in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States. It is to protect these men, to enable them to remain in our armies, that this legislation is sought. All this bill aims to do is to naturalize all these men who desire to fight for the country of their adoption, who otherwise would have no chance or opportunity to become American citizens.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not section 2 admit of the naturalization of other aliens apart from those referred to in section 1?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, yes.

Mr. SABATH. Section 2 applies to all of the aliens who are now serving in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps; it matters not of what nationality they are. I believe that any man who has volunteered, or any man who has not claimed exemption under the selective act, is a good enough man, is made of the right material, has the right conception of his duty to this country, and as such is entitled to all the protection that we can give him, and is also entitled to become a citizen of the United States without any unnecessary trouble or delay.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has made a study of this matter and has introduced a bill, as he indicates. While the gentleman is on his feet, and since he is talking in the time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I desire to ask him one or two questions. Is it not a fact that any alien, not those particularly mentioned in paragraph 1, but any alien who has been in the country one year and who has enlisted for service in the Army or Navy, may become a naturalized citizen of the United States on petitioning a court of competent jurisdiction, as referred to here?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; and on complying with the rules and laws and regulations of our country pertaining to the naturalization of aliens.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As the gentleman is something of an expert I want to ask this question, so that this matter may be made clear to my constituents, who are interested in it: If an alien comes forward to-day and enlists in the Army, he may apply to-morrow for naturalization and be naturalized a citizen of the United States if he can prove that he has been in the country one year. Is not that the fact?

Mr. SABATH. He must prove that he has been in the United States for one year, and he must also prove that he is a man of good moral character, and in addition to that, that he has an honorable record in the Army or Navy or Marine Corps of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He must have the usual qualifications.

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; and be loyal to the United States.

Mr. SABATH. And be loyal to the United States is right.

Mr MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly. That is one of the qualifications. Now, ordinarily a man must wait in this country for five years before he can become a citizen of the United States.

Mr. SABATH. Not only that, but he is subjected to examination, and must prove that he is capable of answering a great many questions that are propounded to him; he must know how to read and write the English language, and there are a great many other things that he is obliged to do before he can become an American citizen.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let us get down to the point I wanted to make. An alien under the law must remain in the United States for five years before he can become a citizen of the United States?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If he joins the Army or the Navy or the Marine Corps and has one year's residence in the United States, he may apply for citizenship and secure it if he has the necessary qualifications?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is to say, he can cut short the period of residence four years and become a citizen if he joins the Army or the Navy?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; that is the intention.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Following up the purpose of the alien-slacker bill, if this bill is adopted, it means that anyone who is an alien in the United States who has been here one year may become naturalized if he enlists in the Army or Navy?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; it means that he will be permitted to fight for our country, because otherwise, if the law is not enacted, there is great danger that he may be discharged on account of being an alien; that he is not an American citizen; and thereby this country would lose from the Army and the Navy seventy-five to a hundred thousand deserving men desirous of fighting for our country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some gentlemen on this side seem to misunderstand the point that the gentleman has been making, and I want to repeat it. This will apply to any alien now or hereafter in the service of the United States, and not only to those specifically referred to in paragraph 1.

Mr. SABATH. That enlist in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would apply to anyone. Any alien except a German enemy alien could become a citizen of the United States after one year's residence upon enlistment if he wanted to.

Mr. SABATH. It will apply to all aliens that are now or will be in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps.

Mr. FESS. Not quite as broad as that, for there is a proviso.

Mr. SABATH. There is a proviso as to people who can not become citizens now.

Mr. FESS. That is what the gentleman from Pennsylvania is driving at.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to show that if a man likely to be deported from the country under the slacker bill is qualified to become a citizen he can make a short cut to citizenship under this bill by enlisting in the Army, the Navy, or the Marine Corps if he has had a year's residence and the requisite qualifications.

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. The people in paragraph 1 have been ordered back by Austria to fight in the Austrian Army. They have not gone, but in case they should be caught they will be treated as deserters. They will be deserters according to the law of Austria and according to our own law, and therefore, unless this bill is passed, we will place all these men in an embarrassing position. If it passes we can claim the men and look upon them as American citizens.

Mr. WALDOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. WALDOW. Does this bill give a change of status to the Poles who have formed themselves into an independent organization? A great many of them have gone to France to fight. We have right outside of my city an army of about 8,000 men, all of them of Polish nationality. Is this going to change their status in any way?

Mr. SABATH. We can not aid them in this bill. There is a separate bill pending now in which I hope we will be able to protect the brave Poles and men of other nationalities who are now joining the so-called Polish and Cecho-Slovak Army in France as well as in Canada. I expect that the bill will be shortly reported and that it will receive the unanimous support of all Members of the House.

Mr. WALDOW. Why is it not possible to have that bill incorporated in this bill?

Mr. SABATH. I think it is a very wise suggestion, and if it will not be objected to I would be more than pleased to look upon the amendment with favor.

Mr. WALDOW. I am very much interested in the proposition. We have over a thousand men from the city of Buffalo alone who have joined the Polish brigade, and it seems to me that they ought to have the protection of the United States.

Mr. SABATH. They are entitled to all the protection we can give them.

Mr. JAMES. Are these people going in a Polish legion—are they going as Poles or Americans?

Mr. SABATH. They are going as Americans. Many of them are citizens of the United States and many of them are not as yet citizens of this country.

Mr. JAMES. Who pays the expense?

Mr. SABATH. The Polish-American people in the United States, as well as other people vitally interested in organizing this splendid body of men. And what applies to the Polish legion and the Polish Army applies to the so-called Bohemian-Slavic Army that is being formed here, in Russia, and France, and is now fighting the cause of the allies across the sea.

Mr. JAMES. Those who are citizens will be taken care of.

Mr. SABATH. No; they will not be taken care of by our Government.

Mr. JAMES. Those who are citizens of the United States?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; but they will not be entitled to any pension or special benefits because they are not joining our forces. For that reason they are entitled to greater consideration than the men who are drafted and who are American citizens, because they do not have to go, but do it of their own free will, desirous of being of aid and assistance to the country of their adoption.

Mr. GALLAGHER. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say that this is the army I referred to a moment ago when I was talking to the chairman. They are not in our Army and therefore this bill would not cover them. They joined the French forces.

Mr. SABATH. I realize the force of the gentleman's statement, and, as I stated before, if an amendment can be framed and will meet with the approval, as it should, of Members here, we should embody it in this bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Can he conceive of any legislation that we could pass which would protect men not citizens of this country who join the armies of one of our allies?

Mr. SABATH. I say in answer to that that we are trying to reach that before the Immigration Committee in this way: We have a bill pending there whereby we will suspend the operation of the immigration law as to all of the aliens who are now going abroad with our forces or with the Polish legions or the Jugo-Slovak armies, or who join the allied forces in Europe.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is true. That will enable those men ultimately, after the war is over, to come back to the United States to become citizens, not having lost any rights by reason of absence from the United States, but it does not protect them during this war.

Mr. SABATH. No; it does not, but the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDOW] might help the situation.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman does not think we ought to undertake to enact a law here throwing the protection of this Government around soldiers enlisted in the army of another nation, does he?

Mr. SABATH. I will say this: They are there fighting the same cause, and where they are of aid and benefit to our country I think we ought to extend to them all the protection and advantages we possibly can.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is very true. We ought to give them every bit of help in our power, and if we take no action at all, if men joining this legion go over and are captured and their lives are in danger, our country ought to aid them and do everything that we can in a moral way, even to the extent of threats of retaliation, to protect them, but could we in any way be justified in passing a law that would say that a man fighting in the Army of Italy or a man fighting in the Army of France or a man fighting in the Army of England, not a citizen of this country, should be a citizen of the United States?

Mr. SABATH. As to those fighting in the allied armies, it might be very hard, because we have no organization by which we could bring about the aid in giving them the benefits of this legislation. We have no courts there and no instrumentalities by which we could make them citizens.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. WALDOW. Why I am so vitally interested is this: Not so much that the men shall receive the pensions and the benefits that our soldiers are going to receive, but, as I said before, there are fully 8,000 men in training now at Fort Niagara, and the great majority of those are not citizens of the United States. I understood our chairman to say that we expected to have a judge visit our different camps and confer citizenship upon the men.

Mr. FLOOD. Upon those who were in our Navy or Marine Corps, not those who are in the armies of other nations.

Mr. WALDOW. Can we not have an amendment to this bill that would take care of that particular camp, because some of them are American citizens and they are all going to fight for the American cause, and I think they ought to have that protection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, to those in whom there remains any doubt as to the merits of this bill I desire to say that the people covered by this bill came to these shores to escape a tyrannical dynasty, allegiance to which they never subscribed and the overthow of which they have struggled and sought for centuries. They came here eager to grasp the opportunities afforded under our institutions and denied them in the land of their birth. They sought to advance and educate themselves and their children, to understand our institutions and the form of government that had given them every opportunity and every advantage afforded to its own citizens and that had made them free men and women. They came here to better their own conditons and to relieve, if possible, their oppressed and persecuted brethren abroad.

That they have done this none can deny. In the mines and in the factories, in the mills and in the shops, upon the farms and in the forests, in the industries and in the professions, in commerce—everywhere they have toiled, labored, and studied for the increased development of the land of their adoption. They have helped and are now helping to turn the great wheels of our industry. They have aided our commerce. They have contributed to our science. They have always been good, true, and loyal residents of this great country of ours. Who can challenge their industry? Who can question their constancy? Who dare impugn their loyalty?

And now, in the hour of our Nation's trial, they have sprung to the support of our country, to sustain our glorious flag, by the thousands, aye, by the tens of thousands, patriotically volunteering and loyally waiving all claims for exemptions, to the end that the Stars and Stripes may ever float over a free and happy people.

We who live in this wonderful democracy of ours can only speak of the wrongs of autocratic government from a theoretical knowledge, but these people who have suffered under it know this form of government from bitter, practical experience.

We are at war to preserve "humanity and democracy." They go to war not only for this reason but in the fond and passionate hope that they might help to secure it for their oppressed kinsman across the seas. Shall we deny them this opportunity because in a technical, and a purely technical, sense they are subjects of Austria-Hungary and Germany? Shall we say to these people that because a brutal and overpowering military force has subjugated you to despotic and tyrannical rule you are barred from assisting in its overthrow, even though you are a loyal and devoted resident of this country? Shall we discourage and dishearten these people, interfere with the wheels of our industries, deplete the mines and the factories of their much-needed man power, diminish the output of our workshops, increase our economic problems, already stupendous, and thereby give "aid and comfort" to our enemies, who are even more their enemies, because of a status beyond their control, the removal of which they have sought with their life's blood these many centuries? Shall we deny them the right to fight for the colors of their adoption and force them into the foreign legion division of France and Italy?

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe such action would be compatible with the principles for which we are striving. In the mines and in the steel mills, in the great ammunition factories, they are steadfastly preparing this country for the mighty conflict in which we are engaged. Whether it be before the fiery furnaces of the steel mills, the stifling depths of the coal mines, the hazards of the ammunition factories, they go about their work steady and contented, satisfied to be of service to this country, the country of their adoption. To be of service is all they ask. Shall we deny them this?

In our Army, Navy, and Marine Corps they are represented by over 76,000, and, if I am reliably informed, that if they are not excluded from the operation of the "alien enemy" laws, our armed forces will in the course of time be deprived of some 400,000 men. What is there that would justify such a course of action?

I know that some will say that these people are responsible for this unpleasant situation because they did not become naturalized. This, however, is due to the harshness and stringency of our naturalization laws.

Mr. Speaker, with a deep faith and irrepressible confidence, I have stood upon the floor of this House upon many an occasion and vouchsafed the good and unimpeachable conduct and behavior of these people. I have never had occasion to regret it, and I say now, with a calm assurance that rests upon my complete faith in them, that they will never give me cause to regret one word or one sentiment. I call upon them now to vindicate my every assertion, to sustain my every utterance, to uphold my every assurance. I call upon them to prove, as I know they will, true to their best traditions, to meet every condition and make every sacrifice required of them with firm resolve and stout hearts, to uphold the ideals of the flag of their adoption—the red, the white, and the blue—to give their lives and their all in defense of these glorious colors, to the end that liberty and democracy may forever be preserved to our sacred country and to her brave "comrades in arms."

I call upon them to inspire and encourage their oppressed brethren in despotic Austria and military-controlled Germany; to rise in their might and break the chains that have held them in bondage and slavery, in misery and in want; to throw off the yoke of their oppressors and those tyrants who are responsible for this terrible war that has destroyed millions of lives; that has taken from mothers their sons, from wives their husbands, from millions of innocent children their fathers; that has driven from the humblest shelter and deprived of life's every necessity—life's every means of sustenance—millions of aged men, women, children, and babes. I also beseech them to call to their kinsmen across the seas and with loud voice exclaim, "Rise from your slumber, you Czecho-Slovaks, descendants of Huss-Ziska! Rise you Poles, descendants of Sobieski, Pulaski, and Kosciusko! Rise you Jugo-Slavs, descendants of Dusan and Kara George! Rise all you subjugated peoples so that the liberty and freedom for which your forefathers hoped, suffered, bled, and died may be attained and to you forever made secure.

And when, aided by all other democracies of the world who are engaged in this monumental struggle to obtain for you this liberty and freedom, you will have helped to break the chains that have shackled you these centuries, then extend in the spirit of brotherly love and benevolence to the peoples of Germany, who are dominated by the iron and ruthless heels of military lords, the hand of friendship and aid, so that they, too—the great common masses of these German peoples who would live in peace with all the peoples of the world, but who are forcefully subjugated by the brutal power of Prussian militarism, which is attempting to conquer the nations of the world.

And, in conclusion, I fervently hope that the great Russian people and their leaders will have the wisdom and foresight to realize that the freedom they have attained and the liberty they have gained can be protected only in concert with the allied democracies of the world; that they will detect the cunning and deceit of the archenemies of every form of democracy and liberty, the autocracies of the Hapsburgs and the Hohenzollerns; that they will not, after all these years of struggle and sacrifice, lose the freedom for which they have paid with their life's blood; that they will once more join hands with the other democracies of the world, so that the sunshine of liberty and democracy may throw its light and its warmth upon all the oppressed countries of the world, be they large or small, powerful or weak; that the peace we seek shall be a righteous and permanent peace wherein all tyrannized peoples and nations shall once more breathe the air of freedom and independence.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in justice to these peoples, in recognition of their unquestioned and devoted loyalty, in consideration of their industry and constancy, and, finally, as a measure of self-protection, a means to sustain and increase our tremendous war preparations, this bill should be passed.

Mr. FLOOD. Why do they not stay here and join the American Army?

Mr. GALLAGHER. They could not do that under our laws. They are outside of the draft age.

Mr. WALDOW. That was the amendment that I had in mind.

Mr. FLOOD. Thousands and thousands of these people have joined the Regular Army, volunteered, who are outside of the draft age.

Mr. GALLAGHER. But these men started since we stopped volunteers from joining the Army. They had no chance to volunteer.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can I have a moment or two? I would like to have about three minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has just three minutes remaining.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then I had better take two and a half minutes, so that the gentleman from Virginia will have a half minute left.

Mr. Speaker, I have long been interested in organization of this Polish legion. I think it is a splendid thing, and one of the finest things on earth about it is that these Poles do not hesitate to join that legion for fear they will be captured by Germany or Austria. I had opportunity to meet with these gentlemen who came from the Continent of Europe when they first started the propaganda in this country. Most of them had been in the German Army, and had been captured or had gotten out, and are now organizing the forces of their brethren to go home to Europe and fight for liberty. That meant to fight against Germany. Those people are not going to be deterred at all because we are not able to give them citizenship, and if we could adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDOW] it would be splendid, but we can not do it. They are not fighting in our forces, nor fighting strictly for our country. I do not believe that those in the Bohemian organization are going to be one whit less courageous and vigorous than those in the Polish organization; and the fact that we can not give them the protection of citizenship is not going to deter them from performing this highly patriotic service. The man who is willing to enlist, who has the courage and the patriotism to enlist in that cause, does not need to be helped by any little addition we might give in a legislative way. He has staked his all, and he is going through with it, and while they should receive every bit of encouragement that we can give, we can not go that far. But this, too, must be said——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, have I any time remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has half a minute.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield that to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to speak for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the committee that the question raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDOW] as to why we should not allow this bill to cover these Poles, who are not citizens of the United States, but are in a training camp, came to us in a very interesting way through the great pianist, Paderewski, when he made a plea before the committee to give these Poles an opportunity to form an army here not to be coalesced with the American Army. When our friends are asking why we did not cover them with citizenship, may I say that he requested that it be not done; that they did not want to lose themselves in the American or any other army. When we raised the question with him that we could not give any particular protection to them if they did not become either American citizens or enter our own Army, he said that we did not really appreciate what the Poles were trying to do. His point was that the Poles in Europe were suffering so much from persecution that they wanted to know there was an army over here, not Polish-Americans nor Polish allies, but an army of Poles and formed as a unit, fighting beside our Army and the allied army, but still as an automatous army that belonged to Poland. He said that it was not any disrespect to the American Government nor any suggestion that they did not want to be allied with the American Government, but the psychological effect it would have upon people back in Poland if they had a real Polish army as a unit fighting for the same thing that we were fighting for. So if it does not cover it it is upon the suggestion of their representatives over here.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for three minutes, by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that we could not grant citizenship to these people, but I do not believe it would be wise to encumber this bill with that proposition now. We have a bill before the Committee on Immigration looking to the admission of these very people, not as ordinary immigrants, not as aliens, but just like any other American citizen coming back to this country. If these men were to be discharged or if any alien were to be discharged who had joined our Army on the other side and should possibly remain on the other side for a period of several months and not come back with his uniform on, or as a soldier, he would have to come back as an ordinary alien, and if he had been shot up over there, although a former member of our Army, having volunteered in our Army or having joined these Czecho-Slovak and Polish independent legions, he could not come back here, because he would be excluded by the immigration law. Therefore, in order to meet that very condition, the Department of Labor sent a bill to me as chairman of the committee, the purpose of which was to allow such alien to come back just like an American citizen who had fought in our Army would come back. We have reported the bill, introduced by Mr. SLAYDEN, and reported by unanimous vote of the members of our committee who were present, which will permit these people to come back. I believe, Mr. Speaker, it ought to pass, and I would not object upon a proper bill being framed and properly considered that these people should be granted the right to make an immediate application for citizenship, if they desire to, and immediately become citizens of this country.

They are not in the same class, Mr. Speaker, with resident alien subjects of cobelligerent nations who join our armies, because every Hungarian, every Pole, who is a citizen or subject of Austria-Hungary or Germany who joins those independent legions and goes over there and fights for the same causes that we are fighting for, if he is captured he will not be treated as an ordinary prisoner as those of cobelligerents who joined our Army would be. He would be treated as a traitor and shot at sunrise, perhaps, because he was guilty of treason against his country. Sometimes I have been denounced as an A. P. A. and an enemy of all foreigners. There is not a man in this House in whose heart beats a greater admiration and reverence for those men who absolutely take their lives into their own hands and know that when they join these independent legions, or join our armies, if they are captured by the Germans or Austrians they will be shot down at once as traitors to their country. It takes almost superhuman courage to volunteer to fight under such conditions. Hence, I believe that upon a properly framed bill—I had not thought of it until this discussion arose—I believe we should endow these men with the same rights and privileges of citizenship that we do other aliens who join our marines, our naval forces, or our armies. I do not believe, as has been said by the chairman of the committee, that we ought now without due consideration to undertake to cumber what seems to me to be a wise bill with provisions which we might well consider at a more opportune time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have another amendment to offer, and that is to strike out section 3.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 3.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. Is the motion to strike out debatable; is this amendment debatable?

The SPEAKER. Of course it is debatable; but the Chair wanted to find out what the gentleman wanted to do.

Mr. WALSH. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee a question in respect to his amendment.

This says:

That application for naturalization in the mode herein provided shall not be open to natives, citizens, subjects, or denizens of Austro-Hungary or Germany, except such individuals and classes as may be exempted by the President under the provisions of section 1 of this act.

Now, is it open to all the other nations associated with Germany and Austria-Hungary in the war?

Mr. FLOOD. I did not catch the gentleman's question. I understood what he said at first.

Mr. WALSH. Is a Bulgarian permitted to become a citizen if he happens to be——

Mr. FLOOD. The amendment I submitted struck out section 3. That would leave the provisions of the bill applicable to any alien of any nation who served in our Army and had had a residence of a year in this country and had complied with the other provisions of this bill, except, of course, those who by our laws are not permitted to become citizens.

Mr. WALSH. That would include, then, enemy aliens?

Mr. FLOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. And would permit them to be naturalized?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH If they qualified by having become connected with the military and naval forces of the United States?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And having resided here for a year. Now, does the gentleman think that it is a wise provision to make them citizens of the United States?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; I thought so.

Mr. WALSH. Although they may have only recently joined the Army or the Navy?

Mr. FLOOD. If they join the Army or Navy of their own free will, showing their desire to fight for this country, can prove their loyalty and a good moral character, I think it is very advisable to make them citizens in order to give them this protection. In the Austro-Hungarian Empire, for instance, half the population is hostile to the Government of that Empire—probably over half of the population—and their feelings are friendly toward the allies and to us. A great many of those people—the Bohemians, Italians, Poles, Slovenes, and others—are in this country. Many of them are already in our military service and are entitled to the protection of our citizenship; others will be encouraged by this legislation to join our forces. They want to fight for America and the cause of human liberty. They want to fight the Government which has suppressed their wills, and they go into the Army for the purpose of making war on the Governments that still claim them as subjects. When they go over to the other side and meet the armies of those Governments and happen to be captured, they are subjected to very much more rigorous treatment than an American soldier with American citizenship would be; they will be treated as traitors, and I think that men who had shown their patriotism to this country, had shown their love of liberty, as they have, and have taken such great risks, should have some consideration shown them, and should have such a law as this passed in their behalf and for their protection.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman think that if a man became a citizen in the Army a few days after a year in the country that that qualification would be looked upon with favor by Germany in case he should be taken prisoner?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know about that. As I said in answer to a question asked by the gentleman from Missouri, we do not know what attention the German Government will pay to this action of ours. But as has been stated here by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and myself, we can retaliate on German and Austrian citizens if those countries treat our citizens, however they may have acquired citizenship, in a way contrary to the rules of civilized warfare.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to these gentleman in debate?

Mr. WALSH. I yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] in order to ask a question, and I am yielding to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] to answer the question.

Now, if he has answered, I desire to ask a question myself. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia how these aliens about whom he has been talking, who are made eligible to become citizens, could in any way be punished by the foreign nations of which they were subject, when under the terms of this bill they are not required to renounce their allegiance to those nations? I would like the gentleman to answer the question, and will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. FLOOD. What was the question?

Mr. WALSH. I said I would yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Look at the proviso on page 3. I think that answers the gentleman's question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to answer?

Mr. FLOOD. I want to answer if I can find out what the question is.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has been talking about these aliens who are now subjects or citizens of certain of the European nations who have seen fit to join our military or naval forces, and stated that if they become citizens under this act these aliens of these foreign nations would probably be punished by their native countries because they joined our forces and because under the provisions of this act they became naturalized. Now, what I want to ask him is why that should necessarily follow, if they are not required to renounce their allegiance to those foreign countries of which they have been heretofore subjects or citizens?

Mr. FLOOD. Because under this law we will naturalize them. They will become citizens of this country under this law, when they take the oath of allegiance to this country.

Mr. WALSH. But that does not divest them of their citizenship in other countries.

Mr. SABATH. It does.

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROGERS. The requirement of this law is that they shall take the oath of allegiance to the United States as now prescribed under the law relating to naturalization.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman from Massachusetts would read section 4 of the naturalization act he would save himself all this trouble in repeating his question, because that sets it out clearly that such an alien, before he can become a citizen under this act, must subject himself and do all other acts required under the present act.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman contends that that is contained in section 4?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; section 4. Has the gentleman the law there—the naturalization act?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Well, if he will read it he will find that what I say is correct. The gentleman has the bill. I was referring to the naturalization act.

Mr. WALSH. I have the law before me in this volume. I was holding the bill. I was not holding the book.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman desires, I can read the section to him. The gentleman is satisfied now, I presume?

Mr. WALSH. I am satisfied nobody has answered the question.

Mr. SABATH. It has answered itself. It is the law.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I think the proviso at the end of section 2, taken in connection with section 4 of the immigration law, takes care of the thing about which he has some concern. There would be absolutely no possibility of making anyone a citizen of the United States until he had renounced his allegiance to the nation whence he comes, so that for that he need have no fear of this law.

I only want to say one thing in regard to the principle contained in this law in connection with what might be termed the companion bill, which has already been reported out from the Committee on Immigration, which provides, as was stated by the chairman of the committee, Mr. BURNETT, for the admission of aliens who have served under our flag and who had taken out their first papers. That bill should be reported and should be acted upon at the earliest possible moment, and when that bill shall have been passed and this one it will practically complete the work of Congress, so far as providing for the care of the immigrant or alien soldier is concerned. About a year ago I took it upon myself to try to ascertain the status of alien soldiers in the armies of all the different nations of the world. It has been a most difficult thing to get exact facts in regard to the status of men in the armies of the different nations, but I have obtained within the last few days the last reports from the different nations throughout the world as to the status of alien soldiers, and with the permission of the House in the very near future I shall address the House on that subject.

I want to say that when we shall have passed this bill in connection with the other laws which we have enacted the United States will be centuries ahead of the rest of the world in caring for its alien soldiers. There is no question so involved as the status of an alien soldier in the several armies of the world. We have been working along here in a spirit of fairness in our attempt to do justice to any man who is willing and ready to don the uniform of the United States and go and fight for our cause and under our flag. With the completion of this legislation—and I speak also when I refer to that to the Slayden bill, which is yet to come—there has been no civilized nation on the earth that has ever dealt so fairly and so honorably and with such consideration for the alien soldier as we have done here.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact, too, that the pay that we give our soldiers, compared with what other soldiers get, and the insurance and the pensions, are greater than those of any other country?

Mr. MEEKER. There has never been anything like it in the world's history—the way this Congress has attempted to provide for our military forces.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Our country has a larger proportion of people who have come to us, not natives, than any other country in the world. Is not that a fact?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. And it is a greater problem with us than with any other nation?

Mr. MEEKER. Certainly. But the attitude of the American Congress, which of course is the voice of the American people on this question, the willingness on the part of the American Government to go the whole length for the alien soldier under our flag, is one of the most striking illustrations of the really cosmopolitan spirit of the United States that could be given. I am sure that when I submit to you the different reports of the nations throughout the world as to what they will do and what they will not do for alien soldiers in their armies it will be a surprise to the Members of this House as to how far we have gone. And yet we have not gone beyond the line of justice in any instance, in my judgment, but we have done only the fair thing.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think it would be interesting to add there that the record of the Provost Marshal on this shows that the proportion of aliens is 8 to 5; in other words, out of 123,000 men called out, 85,000 are aliens under the law.

Mr. MEEKER. I thank the gentleman for his statement.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment and to ask the chairman a question. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] suggested that the language ought to be changed so that the applicant will not personally have to appear in court. I desire to ask the chairman if he has an amendment pending to accomplish that purpose? I understood that it was expected to be accomplished.

I will say, after a further reading of the bill, that I do not know but that the point raised by the gentleman from Kansas is well taken, although I did not think it was at first. For instance, on line 25 it reads:

> And shall also require him to take the oath of allegiance to the United States as now prescribed under the law relating to naturalization.

Now the man has to take that personally in the presence of the court, before the court, and if we do not make an exception he would still have to do that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I noticed that provision in the law. He should make the oath before the commanding officer in the presence of his comrades.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman has nothing better to offer, I will make a suggestion.

Mr. FLOOD. What is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. To amend the bill in two places. In line 20, after the word "require," I propose to insert the words "the appearance of the applicant in person or by attorney, and," so that it will read:

> The court before admitting such alien to citizenship shall require the appearance of the applicant in person or by attorney, and oral or documentary proofs—

And so forth. And then, in line 25, strike out the word "as" and at the end of the sentence, or after the word "naturalization" and before the period, insert:

> Such oath to be taken orally in court or to be made in writing by subscribing to such oath in writing and in the presence of at least two witnesses.

Mr. SNYDER. I should like to ask the gentleman what section 4 does to that? Does not that authorize the President to make rules and regulations?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think the President could make a rule or regulation that would violate the law.

Mr. SNYDER. No; but he might make a rule or regulation that would establish a court.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], who is thoroughly familiar with this question, can inform us whether or not under section 2, without that, the applicant himself would not be required to go into court.

Mr. BURNETT. It is a question of the construction of legal terms more than of familiarity with these rules. I will ask the gentleman, as it is upon petition filed, a man may file a petition either himself or by attorney, or by sending it, that following it up by "oral or documentary proofs," taking those two together, does not the gentleman think the fact that he is required to file a petition does not require his personal appearance there?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think that would be true as to the first part but not as to the latter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the general law provides that he must appear in court.

Mr. BURNETT. As I recollect it. I can not recall all those details.

Mr. BUTLER. He is subject to catechism when he reaches court.

Mr. SNYDER. How can you get a man into court when he is in France?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] are all right. I suggest to him that he ask unanimous consent to return to those sections and offer those amendments.

Mr. BUTLER. It does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. All right. I move to amend——

The SPEAKER. There is already an amendment pending. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] moves to strike out section 3.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] withdraws his pro forma amendment, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is recognized to offer his amendments.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I move to amend, in line 20, page 2, after the word "require," by inserting the words "the appearance of the applicant in person or by attorney and."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER of Minnesota: Page 2, line 20, after the word "require," insert the following: "the appearance of the applicant in person or by attorney and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I move to amend, on page 3, line 1, after the word "naturalization," by inserting the following: "such oath to be taken orally in court or to be made in writing by subscribing his name thereto under oath and in the presence of at least two witnesses who are citizens of the United States."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER of Minnesota: Page 3, line 1, after the word "naturalization," insert the following: "such oath to be taken orally in court or to be made in writing by subscribing his name thereto under oath and in the presence of at least two witnesses who are citizens of the United States."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that would necessarily imply that the oath must be taken before some officer authorized to administer oaths.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. We would not want any lapsus on that.

Mr. PADGETT. That ought to be specified.

Mr. BURNETT. Possibly the debate showing that was the intention might be sufficient, but it would not hurt us to have it so stated.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota offer that language?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do. After the word "oath" in the amendment which has been submitted insert "before an officer authorized to administer an oath."

Mr. PADGETT. Having a seal of office.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And having a seal of office.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota modifies the amendment as follows: After the word "oath" insert "before an officer authorized to administer an oath and having a seal of office."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this amendment, for the reason that we are opening the door here pretty wide to all sorts of opportunities for abuses and fraudulent naturalization, although I heartily favor conferring citizenship on the thousands of patriotic aliens who have joined our colors. The general law upon the matter of administering the oath to the certificate of naturalization requires that before a person can be admitted to citizenship he shall declare on oath in open court that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and so forth. Now, the amendment here proposes that the applicant, after having filed his petition in court in accordance with the requirements of law, which set forth his intention to subscribe to the oath of allegiance and to take the oath of renunciation against any foreign Government, can go before some official and take the oath in the presence of two witnesses. It may be a justice of the peace or a notary public having a seal of office, and we divest that act of all the solemnity and dignity with which we now clothe the administration of the oath of citizenship to the applicant under the general law. A further objection, in my opinion, is that I have grave doubts whether we can prescribe in this way for these particular people under the Constitution a rule of naturalization and take them out of the general law in the way we are attempting to do here. I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Alabama that it is wise to naturalize these patriotic men who have responded to the call, who have joined our Army and Navy, and have gone forth to fight for the preservation of humanity, and to make the world safe for democracy and democracy safe for the world.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman realize that this is intended to apply to men in the Army and in the Navy, and if it is to be of any avail it will have to be provided that the oath can be taken where the soldier and the sailor is?

Mr. WALSH. I realize the difficulty, and I appreciate that there are many gentlemen on the high seas who will not be able to subscribe to the oath because there is no official there having a seal; but when they come into port they can go into a court of record having a seal prescribed by the law and take that oath. I think that is not too much to require of them, even though they are performing heroic service, and in a sense are hereby rewarded for it by this legislation.

Mr. TILSON. If this is intended to make it easy, ought it not to be provided that they may take the oath before the Judge Advocate General?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Oh, no; it ought to be in some court of record.

Mr. WALSH. It would destroy the uniformity of the law, and the Constitution requires that we shall have established uniform rules of naturalization.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. I recognize the force of the suggestion in regard to the uniformity required by the Constitution, but I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that for many years we have had a species of this kind of naturalization—that of a discharged alien soldier, seaman, or marine; that has lacked uniformity in the way that there is a difference in the period of time. Those were cases which, under the strict construction made by the gentleman, would be a lack of uniformity of naturalization; but the courts have upheld them. The main difference between this and the statutes that have existed is the personal status that they were granted a naturalization after discharge, and this is for the purpose of making all the statutes harmonize and uniform and allowing them naturalization independent of a discharge. That is the difference between the law as it exists and this bill.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman will not contend that this law harmonizes the naturalization laws?

Mr. BURNETT. According to the construction of the court those previous laws harmonized with the naturalization laws, and this makes it more harmonious.

Mr. WALSH. Since the general naturalization law was passed, which differed materially from the law prior to that time, the Supreme Court of the United States has not passed on the question which the gentleman raises and which he says arose during the days of the Civil War. My contention is that we are not providing a uniform rule, but that in enacting this statute we are affecting the uniformity that prevailed under the general law and destroying it. In that respect we are not harmonizing the naturalization laws of the country.

Mr. BURNETT. These other statutes were not technically harmonious, and yet the courts have construed it where it applied to a general class, not to individuals, as not conflicting with the constitutional provisions that the gentleman refers to.

Mr. WALSH. I have serious doubts as to whether any court would hold that the provisions of this law were applicable to a class; they are only applicable to certain individuals who may have joined the military forces. There is no class about that; it is an individual action, purely voluntary; the action of these gentlemen who may volunteer and join these forces is an individual action, and would not seem to me to establish a classification in the true sense of the word.

Now, what do you do? Any man who may hereafter join our military forces, who may be a pacifist, who may be the subject or a citizen of Austria-Hungary, who may have lived here for 20 years, who may have been a citizen or subject of Germany, who may have been voting in certain jurisdictions throughout the country, may join the Army—and he may have joined the Army in some occupation which does not require him to shoulder a gun—he files his petition, and he can get two of his pacifist colleagues to go before some little obscure official, make oath of allegiance to the United States, if that official has a seal. And after having filed his petition and making his oath submitting his oral proof, not by himself as an individual but through an attorney, we confer upon him the citizenship of this great Republic. I say the mere fact that these gentlemen have joined our forces and are assisting us in fighting these battles, rather than joining the forces of their own nation, is not a sufficient reason why we should tear down the naturalization laws and make it easy to procure naturalization and open the door for opportunities for fraudulent practices.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts has unintentionally borrowed a good deal of trouble that he has put into the statute. A petitioner for citizenship who is in the service of the United States, either on land or sea, may file his petition for citizenship in the court at his home having jurisdiction, through his attorney, where his friends will appear, and when he has been notified that the court has passed upon his case he may appear before an officer and subscribe to the oath sent to him by the court. That I take it is the procedure if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. SNYDER. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I would like to ask how that would benefit a man who has gone to France.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In the same way exactly.

Mr. SNYDER. When would he become a citizen? As soon as he got back to this country?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. As soon as the oath was returned and filed in the proceedings of the court.

Mr. SNYDER. He could become a citizen practically in the field?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. SNYDER. That is the way I want it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was the intention of the amendment, to apply to any man on the seas or in the foreign service who can comply with the necessary requirements. All that he would have to do would be to submit the matter to his attorney. He would go through the usual proceedings in the court having jurisdiction, offer his proof as to the loyalty or good character of the applicant, as is provided in the general statute, and then the soldier or the sailor, as the case might be, whether on the sea, in a camp 1,500 miles from his home, or in a foreign field, would subscribe the oath provided for, return that to the court having tried the case, and file it with his petition. That is the intention I think of this bill. Unfortunately the bill has been considered in a rather informal way. The bill would have more effective consideration if it had come up on some other calendar. I think there is no danger of opening the door to fraud or injustice by simply providing that these men who have regularly enlisted, whose enlistments are known, shall have the opportunity to become citizens.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, of course the gentleman is aware that frauds are practiced under the law as it now exists?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman what is his understanding as to when this alien becomes a citizen?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. As soon as the oath is filed in the court that heard the proceeding.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Chairman of the committee a question that suggested itself to my mind. Is there anything in this second section that presupposes that the applicant or the petitioner shall have been a resident? I do not believe that we ought to let people become citizens who have never been here?

Mr. SABATH. They must have been residents of the United States for at least a year.

Mr. BURNETT. I had overlooked that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the explanation of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] certainly does not satisfy me that we ought to adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER]. I have expressed my views upon it, and I hope that it will not prevail.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Miller amendment.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Insert, after section 2, as a new section the following:

"Any alien who comes within the provisions of section 2 and who is in the performance of his duties in a foreign country may be admitted to citizenship by a consul general or consul of the United States stationed in such country: Provided, however, That the requirements of section 2 in respect to proofs and the oath of allegiance shall apply to aliens seeking citizenship under the provisions of this section: And provided further, That the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Labor shall jointly prescribe regulations for the administration of this section."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield before he begins his argument?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not that do away with all court proceedings?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I think it ought not to be passed.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, Congress last autumn passed a law permitting repatriation of Americans who had lost their citizenship by enlisting in the armies of our allies before the United States entered the war and who had taken the oath of allegiance to such countries, which under our laws automatically operated as an expatriation. That law which Congress passed provided that citizenship could again be acquired simply by appearing before a consular officer of the United States abroad and taking the oath of allegiance to the United States. In other words, Congress has already committed itself to the policy of permitting the acquisition of American citizenship while the seeker of citizenship is abroad. That law had the approval of both the Secretary of State and the Department of Labor, and was very carefully considered by the Committee on Immigration of the House as well as by the Committee on Military Affairs. I think we are all in sympathy with the purpose of the bill which is now under consideration. I think we want to make it easy for these American boys to acquire the name of American citizenship in addition to possessing the attributes of American citizenship, which they have shown they already possess by their service in our Armies. Gov. SHALLENBERGER a few moments ago stated that there are 123,000 aliens in our draft camps to-day, all of whom will presumably be going over to France within a very few months. We do not know how long this bill will be under consideration in Congress; we do not know how long it will take before it becomes a law. Even if it should be enacted promptly, many men would not realize the opportunity that was held out to them by the provisions of the law and would not take advantage of it to acquire citizenship before they sailed for France.

After they are in France they could, perhaps, under the amendments offered by Mr. MILLER which have just been adopted, in time acquire citizenship; but we all know it would be an exceedingly cumbrous and an exceedingly lengthy process if they should undertake to acquire citizenship over in France in view of the slow mail service, of the delays incident to working out the mechanical processes, and of the scantiness of the information at their disposal upon the procedure to be followed. Suppose a man performs an act of great bravery; suppose a man shows himself worthy of a commission while he is in France. He can not be an officer unless he is a citizen. It may be months, it may be a year, before he gets his papers in such shape that he may receive an award of a commission of which his superior officers deemed him abundantly worthy and which is held up only by the fact, and the incidental fact, of his noncitizenship.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will, with pleasure.

Mr HICKS. My friend spoke a moment ago about the repatriation law which we passed last fall. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts happen to know or can he give a guess as to the number of our citizens who are now in foreign armies, that is to say, approximately?

Mr. ROGERS. I have no information on that particular point. I do recall, however, that the best estimate we could obtain of the men covered by that act was from forty to sixty thousand. It has been taken advantage of by a considerable number of men. I regret that I can not tell the gentleman from New York how many are left who might come within its terms or the exact number of men who have already acquired citizenship under it.

As I said a moment ago, Congress has established the policy of granting American citizenship abroad. It did it in that exceedingly worthy case, and I submit to the House there can be no serious argument why it should not extend the policy so as to apply in this worthy case. The amendment which I have offered provides that the regulations shall be arranged jointly by the Secretary of State and by the Secretary of Labor. They are the naturalizing and the citizenship officials of our Cabinet, and they can be depended upon to surround this process with every possible safeguard.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. ROGERS. I do.

Mr. SABATH. The amendment as the gentleman submitted it for consideration refers to section 2?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. As section 1 has been eliminated, section 2 will be numbered section 1 by the Clerk, and I suggest to the gentleman in those two particulars that the gentleman change it to section 1

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend my amendment by inserting section 1 in lieu of section 2.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. MILLER of Minnesota rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, may I make a further suggestion to the gentleman?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I gathered, when the Clerk read the amendment offered by the gentleman, it made no reference to procedure, excepting in a few instances, and my suggestion is, would it not be advisable in that part of the gentleman's amendment in which he refers to this act that he use the word "procedure." If I had the amendment before me, I could tell exactly where it should come in.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask my colleague what is the object in allowing the Secretary of State and Secretary of Labor to make regulations, when in section 4 the President is authorized to make such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the act. I wondered——

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I think the point is well taken, and I will eliminate that portion of my amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That portion of the gentleman's amendment to which I referred was where it reads "that the requirements of section 1 in respect to proof and the oath of allegiance shall apply," and so forth. Now, that does not cover the procedure which they are put to on account of taking the oath and submitting proof, and I therefore suggest that the word "procedure" be substituted——

Mr. ROGERS. Be added?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Be added just ahead of the word "proof." That also would make it conform to section 4, which would be section 3.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have read the amendment as modified and that it be considered in lieu of the amendment offered by me which was just read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have the modified amendment read in lieu of the other, which he withdraws. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if we can not get an agreement. I would like to move the previous question on the bill and all amendments——

Mr. MONDELL. I would like to have about five minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I would like to have about three minutes in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. FLOOD. How would it do to say at the end of 10 minutes?

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know whether there are any other amendments.

Mr. FLOOD. I have not heard of any more.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts, my colleague——

Mr. ROGERS. I have no other amendments to offer.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of 10 minutes' debate the previous question be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that at the end of 10 minutes the previous question be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Who is to have the 10 minutes?

Mr. FLOOD. How much did you say you wanted?

Mr. MONDELL. Five minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. And the gentleman from Alabama three.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] may desire more time.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not wish any more time.

Mr. BURNETT. Do you mean the previous question on the bill?

Mr. FLOOD. And all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The amendments and the bill to final passage. Is there objection to the requestion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] for 10 minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ROGERS: Insert, after section 1, as a new section the following:

"Any alien who comes within the provisions of section 1 and who is in the performance of his duties in a foreign country, may be admitted to citizenship by a consul general or consul of the United States stationed in such country: Provided, however, That the requirements of section 1 in respect to procedure, proofs, and the oath of allegiance shall apply to aliens seeking citizenship under the provisions of this section."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago we were considering the case of alien slackers. To-day we are considering the case of alien patriots. Many thousands of patriotic men, citizens of the lands with whom we are at war, have enlisted in the service of the United States. Those men when they reach foreign shores and take their places on the battle line, if captured while still citizens of their native lands will be subject to the pains and penalties of treason. It is not altogether certain that we can beyond question save them from such punishment. Whatever we may do, Germany and Austria may still claim them as citizens and if captured treat them accordingly. We should at least go as far as possible toward protecting them in case of capture. We can give them the opportunity to become American citizens and then insist with all our might that they shall if captured be treated as other American citizens taken as prisoners of war. If this is to be done, as it should be for these patriotic men, it must be done in a way that will be effective, and make it possible for them to take advantage of the American citizenship we hold out to them and secure the protection that it affords. It may be said that what is proposed is irregular, that this is not a usual and approved procedure.

It is true it is not the proper procedure for conferring citizenship under ordinary conditions, but unless we make some such provision as is contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts we might just as well forego any attempt to bring these men within the protection of American citizenship, for some of them are not and will not be able to appear before the courts or have their cases considered by the courts in time to afford them the protection they deserve. Some of them are already on foreign shores, some of them are on the ocean on their way over there, and we must make it possible for them to acquire citizenship in some such way as this amendment provides or it will be utterly impossible for us to protect them or to attempt to protect them as American citizens. That being true, it seems to me we ought to waive all questions of unusual or irregular proceedings. These are unusual and extraordinary cases, and we must depart from the usual procedure if we are to give these men the protection we seek to give them. Let us do it in a way that will be effective by adopting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS]. I glory in the courage and loyalty of these men, who boldly and freely offer themselves to our cause though by so doing they subject themselves to dangers the native born is not subjected to. There are no better patriots than these men of foreign birth. Let us give them the protection of American citizenship.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that I had a conversation with some gentleman representing the Bureau of Naturalization in regard to a question of this kind, and if I am correct in that statement, and I think I am, the suggestion was made by him that it would greatly confuse the records, and that there would be so much uncertainty involved in the whole question, that there would be nothing here to determine the question of the citizenship for months perhaps after they had made their attempt to acquire citizenship. Granting naturalization is at least a quasi judicial function that is sought to be conferred on American consuls and consuls general. It seems to me that the Miller amendment makes the bill go as far as it ought to go unless we have mature deliberation upon it. The committee evidently considered very carefully the other phases of the bill——

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman answer this question?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. How long do you think it would take under the Miller amendment for a man who is now in France, a soldier, who lived out in Kansas somewhere, to get his papers back and become a citizen, from the time he applied?

Mr. BURNETT. No longer, Mr. Speaker, than it would take for the consul general or the consul to get the papers back here, if he took the testimony over there.

Mr. SNYDER. That does not quite answer the question. I would like the gentleman's judgment on the time it would take to do what I asked.

Mr. BURNETT. With the retarded mails, I would refer the gentleman, with due respect, to the Post Office Department, but I can not say either when the decision of the consul general would get here——

Mr. MONDELL. What would be the status of the soldier in the meantime if he was captured?

Mr. BURNETT. If you conferred this judicial function upon the consul or consul general, perhaps his status would be that of a citizen. But, gentlemen, it is doubtful whether we should thus rapidly citizenize. Who is the consul general? The consul general usually performs his duty over there by a deputy, and frequently that deputy is an alien himself who would pass upon that question. I remember at Messina the deputy consul was an Italian, who never was naturalized, and he performed the duties of a consul.

Mr. SNYDER. Will you not kindly make an estimate of the time you think it would take to make a soldier who is now in France, who might be a resident of some city in Kansas, a citizen?

Mr. BURNETT. It ought not to take, Mr. Speaker, in due course of mail, more than three or four weeks. He could mail his application and affidavits, and the judge would pass upon it eo instanti, because when it got there that would be the duty of the judge, and he could pass on it in court or in chambers, as they frequently do.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS.]

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, may we have that amendment read again?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Rogers amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title of the bill will be amended in conformity with the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 6361, known as the soldiers and sailors' civil rights bill.

The SPEAKER. How long will it take?

Mr. WEBB. It would not take longer than for the Speaker to put it, unless some gentleman wants to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6361) to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement was read.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6361) to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

On amendments Nos. 1, 3, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 39, and 43, on which the House recedes: Are but changes in the verbiage and do not substantially change the meaning of the act.

On amendment No. 2: The House here recedes with an amendment. This amendment relates to those who are entitled to come in and have the benefits of the act. The House included "field clerks who have taken the oath as members of the military forces of the United States." The Senate amended the bill by striking this out and inserting "Army field clerks; field clerks, Quartermaster Corps; civilian clerks and employees on duty with the military forces or detailed for service abroad in accordance with provisions of existing law." The amendment agreed upon in conference to the Senate amendment was to strike out the word "or," and the effect thereof is to make the act apply only to civilian clerks and employees when detailed for service abroad.

On amendment No. 4: The Senate recedes. The amendment added by the Senate was deemed surplusage.

On amendment No. 5: The House here recedes with an amendment. The Senate amendment was added to protect the rights of persons secondarily liable, including guarantors, sureties, and indorsers, in cases where relief under the terms of the act had been granted to the principal obligor. The amendment as agreed upon in conference rewrites the section 103 as added by the Senate without substantially modifying the meaning. The part of the Senate amendment which provides that "such contract or obligation shall be construed as if such payment were not due or the time for the performance of such act had not arrived" was so modified as not to provide for a change in the date when payment was due or the date when the act was to be performed, but provided for relief by a stay, postponement, or suspension of proceedings, or by the setting aside and vacating judgments or orders.

On amendment No. 6: The Senate here recedes. The effect of the Senate amendment was to require the fact to appear by affidavit that the defendant is in the military service. As agreed upon in conference, this fact may appear from any competent testimony.

On amendments Nos. 7 and 8: The House recedes as to both amendments. The effect of these amendments is to make the provisions of the act applicable where the person in military service is the plaintiff as well as where he is the defendant in any action or proceeding.

On amendment No. 9: The House recedes. As the bill passed the House relief was to be given the party in military service unless his ability to comply with the judgment or order sought was not materially affected by such service. The amendment agreed on makes the test depend upon his ability to conduct his defense.

On amendment No. 10: House here recedes. This amendment makes a verbal correction.

On amendment No. 11: The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 12: The Senate recedes. The matter contained in this Senate amendment seemed to the conferees to be sufficiently covered by the provisions in the bill as it passed the House.

On amendment No. 13: The House recedes with an amendment by which the word "solely" is changed to "chiefly." The effect of this change is apparent.

On amendment No. 14: The House recedes. This amendment makes section 300 apply in proceedings as well as actions.

On amendment No. 15: The House recedes, with an amendment which strikes out the clause requiring the insured to file with his application for the benefits provided the consent of any person other than the insured who may have an interest in the insurance. This will leave this matter of detail to be taken care of by the rules promulgated by the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance.

On amendments Nos. 22, 23, 24, 25, and 26: The Senate recedes as to these amendments. Section 402 as passed by the House applied to contracts of insurance. The Senate amendments would make it apply to insurance where policies had been issued. The conference agreement leaves the section applicable to all contracts of insurance whether covered by policies or not.

On amendment No. 27: The House recedes. This amendment takes out of the class of policies which the Government will keep from lapsing those on which there is outstanding a policy loan or other indebtedness equal to or greater than 50 per cent of its cash surrender value.

On amendment No. 28: The Senate recedes. This amendment was made by the Senate to effect the change sought to be made to section 402 as pointed out above.

On amendments Nos. 29 and 30: The House recedes as to these. The House bill provided that where the applications were on policies aggregating more than $5,000, whether on one or more policies or in one or more companies by a person in military service, the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance should select which of such applications should be rejected. These amendments permit the insured to indicate an order of preference, and in event he does not then it required the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance to reject the policies having the least cash surrender value sufficient to reduce the face value of the insurance within the $5,000.

On amendment No. 38: The House recedes. This amendment added by the Senate requires semiannual statements to be made by the insurer to the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance.

On amendment No. 40: The House recedes with an amendment. This Senate amendment provides for the Government holding the policies on which premiums have been paid by it free from liens except such as existed at the time the policy became subject to the act. The amendment added in conference prohibits the payment of dividends on the policy which may prejudice the security given the Government by the lien provided.

On amendment No. 41: The House recedes with an amendment. This Senate amendment requires the consent of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, in writing, before any loan or settlement is made by the insurer, and by the amendment agreed to in conference such consent must also be obtained before any dividend is paid by the insurer.

On amendment No. 42: The House recedes. This Senate amendment excepts those proceedings, remedies, privileges, stays, limitations, accountings, or other transaction from the effect which would result from the clause limiting the act to six months after the termination of the war, when authorized under any section or provision of the act, for such time as may be necessary for their exercise or enjoyment.

E. Y. WEBB,
C. C. CARLIN,
A. J. VOLSTEAD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

The SPEAKER. How much?

Mr. WEBB. Just for a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the chairman of the committee explain in a general way what changes have been made in the bill as it originally left the House, and particularly as to amendment No. 5, covering section 103, which I believe is a substantial amendment to the bill?

Mr. WEBB. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the bill has not been changed in any substantial degree from the way it passed the House. The Senate added 42 amendments, but most of them were verbal, and in many cases we substituted new language for their amendment.

Now, as to amendment No. 5, if the gentleman will read the substitute for it he will notice that that takes care of those secondarily liable. The Senate in its amendment arbitrarily deferred the obligation for payment on the part of the person secondarily liable, but the conferees objected to that because they felt that there were occasions when indorsers for bonding companies ought to pay the soldier's obligation if it appeared to the court that the soldier was bankrupt, and we therefore drew an amendment leaving it to the discretion of the court to determine whether the indorser or bonding company should immediately pay the obligation of the soldier.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any substantial change as to insurance companies?

Mr. WEBB. No; excepting that we add that no dividends should be paid to the soldier without consent of the Government; in fact, that the dividend should be paid to the Government after the policy is transferred to the Government.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

CIVIL-SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, to facilitate the passage of this joint resolution rather than make a motion to suspend the rules and pass it, I would ask for unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate joint resolution 117, relative to the holding of civil-service examinations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 117, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) amending the act of July 2, 1909, governing the holding of civil-service examinations.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act of July 2, 1909 (36 Stat. L., 1), is hereby amended so as to permit the United States Civil Service Commission, during the period of the war, to hold examinations of applicants for positions in the Government service in the District of Columbia, and to permit applicants from the several States and Teritories of the United States to take said examinations in the said District of Columbia. Said examinations shall be permitted in addition to those required to be held by said act of July 2, 1909 (36 Stat. L., 1).

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, insert, after the word "the," the word "present."
Line 10, after the word "Columbia," insert "and elsewhere in the United States where examinations are usually held."
Page 2, at end of line 4, add:
"Provided, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to abridge the existing law of apportionment."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, is this the bill that was formerly submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GODWIN] for consideration?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe when it was under consideration before that he had no objection to certain amendments that were suggested at that time. I believe they were suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]. Can the Chair inform the House what the calendar is of this bill?

The SPEAKER. House Calendar 86.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] does not insist on the amendment now. He is of the opinion, as are other gentlemen who have made the same objection to it, that the resolution covers the objection. The amendment of the committee covers it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am satisfied, after looking into the matter, that it does cover it, and that it will not go back beyond the 12 months' time, so that I see no necessity for putting that amendment in.

Mr. KITCHIN. Each one of those who made the objection, including the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL], have looked into it and have withdrawn their objections.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] desired to offer an amendment to this resolution when it was considered. He was in the Chamber a few minutes ago. He desires to offer an amendment to the following effect: At the end of the proviso on page 2, to change the requirements of the existing law as to legal residence and domicile of such applicant.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is absolutely unnecessary. I looked up the law myself. This resolution does not change the law as to residence and domicile of applicants. It simply gives the qualified applicant the privilege of taking the examination in the District of Columbia or elsewhere when an examination is held, if he be temporarily absent from the State of his residence and domicile, without compelling him to return to his State to take the examination, as the law now requires. Mr. McIlhenny, the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, is emphatic in the opinion that this resolution does not change any of the requirements as to residence and domicile; that an applicant, if this resolution is passed, must have the same identical qualifications that he must now have under the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] stated that he had taken this matter up with the Civil Service Commission and had also given considerable study to the law itself, and he was of the opinion that this amendment should be incorporated. I can not see where any harm can be done by incorporating it.

Mr. KITCHIN. We would like this to be a law at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not desire to delay.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will assure the gentleman that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] is mistaken in his construction, and that his proposed amendment is unnecessary; that the resolution itself as it is accomplishes what he wishes. If he were here, I think I could convince him. The plain language is to permit the applicant, who must be a qualified applicant under existing law, to take the examination in the District or State where he is temporarily, instead of requiring him to go back to his home State. For instance, in Wisconsin——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman kindly defer consideration of this measure until the gentleman from Pennsylvania comes into the Chamber?

Mr. KITCHIN. We have postponed this a half a dozen times until some gentleman or other came in.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would even be willing to have an order made to consider it to-morrow under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman by a reading of it will see that this resolution needs no amendment to prevent what the gentleman from Pennsylvania fears.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. FESS. In conversation with the man who has charge of the allotments from the Civil Service Commission in the Ordnance Department I was told that the present practice was very hurtful and quite inconvenient, and without this bill under the present regulations people would be sent back, and that it would be very hurtful. He urged that it be passed.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad the gentleman called the attention of the House to the necessity of early passage of the resolution. A member of the War Trade Board has been to see me not less than three times urging it. Mr. McIlhenny, chairman of the Civil Service Commission, and Mr. Gans, a member of the War Trade Board, came down four or five days ago to see the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and myself. I will say that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], who has just stepped out, favors the bill, and both of us were convinced that the resolution should not be delayed longer. Here is what this will remedy——

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the whole purpose of the bill, but I have not given as much thought to the amendments as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] has, and in his absence I am acting in his stead.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit me, he will remember that before our holiday recess the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], member of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, attempted to get this bill or a similar bill without the present amendments up by unanimous consent. I objected, because I thought it ought to be amended. It came over from the Senate. The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, as I recollect, had reported the bill or resolution without amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman is in error. The bill was not reported until the middle of January.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; I am not mistaken as to what took place with regard to this or a similar bill unamended.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Such a bill or resolution came over from the Senate just before we adjourned for Christmas, and it was sought to take it up in the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. It never came into this House until January 4.

Mr. KITCHIN. Evidently since the holidays another bill or resolution was introduced and sent over here. The gentleman from Oklahoma the day we adjourned or the day before asked that the bill or a similar bill without the present amendments be considered. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] will recall that.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; that is true.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Oklahoma came to me with some kind of a bill or joint resolution to amend the civil-service act so that parties could take their examinations here instead of going back home, and I objected to it because the amendments now in the resolution were not in it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How much time will this bill take if unanimous consent is granted?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, it is just a page and a half long.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will it provoke discussion?

Mr. KITCHIN. We are discussing it now, and as soon as we get unanimous consent it will pass, I hope, without any further discussion.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I do, however, want to call attention to the condition of affairs that renders this sort of legislation seemingly necessary. It seems that there are a large number of people here from the various States of the Union, who, it is to be assumed, came here with the understanding that they were to obtain positions in the Government departments. A large number of them are now holding temporary positions. Who brought these people here? Where did they come from? On whose invitation did they come here? Did any gentleman on the Republican side suggest to any constituent that there was a chance of securing a job, however insignificant or temporary, without passing a civil service examination? I imagine not. These folks came here, did they not, on the invitation of gentlemen on the Democratic side? "Yes, come on," we can imagine the gentlemen on the Democratic side saying to their inquiring constituents, "there are opportunities galore, plenty of jobs for deserving Democrats. Come ye all; come ye all. Come to Washington. Your Uncle Sam will give you a good job instanter on the recommendation of a Democratic Congressman or Senator." And they are here in large numbers; good folks, no doubt, well intentioned probably. It is not their fault that they have been brought here without an understanding of the situation as a part of the patronage of Democratic Congressmen and Senators; but that every one of them is a deserving Democrat, or a Democrat who claims to be deserving, there is no manner or sort of doubt. What we on this side are asked to do is to give an opportunity to Democrats who have been brought from hither and yon, invited here by their Congressmen or their Senators, and given temporary employment to fill up the Government service—we are now asked to give these people an opportunity to take the civil service examinations in order that they may become permanently attached to the Federal crib. Well, I think probably some of them at least are needed, and it is hardly fair to compel them to go back home to take the examinations. We will try and overlook the fact that probably few, if any, of our political faith will be aided or affected by the legislation. I can say that with knowledge, so far as I am personally concerned. And yet I am very glad to have this done. In fact I think it is necessary and important under the circumstances that it should be done.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. COX. There are two from my district and both are Republicans.

Mr. MONDELL. What Democratic Congressman invited them here?

Mr. COX. I did not do it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] is on his way here from his office. Will not the gentleman defer the case for a few minutes?

Mr. MADDEN. The regular order!

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. If that reasonable request can not be granted, I will object.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate joint resolution as amended by the House Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill with the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) amending the act of July 2, 1909, governing the holding of civil-service examinations.

Resolved, etc., That the act of July 2, 1909 (36 Stat. L., 1), is hereby amended so as to permit the United States Civil Service Commission, during the period of the present war, to hold examinations of applicants for positions in the Government service in the District of Columbia, and to permit applicants from the several States and Territories of the United States to take said examinations in the said District of Columbia and elsewhere in the United States where examinations are usually held. Said examinations shall be permitted in addition to those required to be held by said act of July 2, 1909 (36 Stat. L. 1): Provided, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to abridge the existing law of apportionment.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. STAFFORD. I demand a second.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and there were 102 ayes and 3 noes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin to 20 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to enable those who wish to enter the Government employment who come here to take the civil-service examination. The present law requires them to take the examination in the district in which they reside. This bill proposes to permit them to take it in Washington City or elsewhere, wherever they happen to be.

Now, there is, I think, an amendment that ought to go in the bill in order to protect the various districts against an unfair assignment of civil-service employees against them. For instance, if a man has lived in Washington 25 or 30 years, held a Government position, raised a family, and that man still continues to go back in presidential years to his district to vote, he is a resident of that district, and under the civil-service law he is charged against that district. The children that have grown up in his family, if this bill is passed, can take an examination in Washington City, take a Government position under the civil-service law, and yet be assigned or charged against the district of the parent's residence, although they have never lived a day therein.

I am speaking of a concrete example that occurred in my own district. I know a man that has not been in my district except on presidential-election days, and not always then, who holds office in Washington, enjoys a large salary, and is charged against my district. His family, if this bill passes, will be entitled to take Government service, be examined here in Washington City by the Civil Service Commission, and be charged up against my district, to the exclusion of bona fide residents there who should be charged against it, and no others should be so charged.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I would like to finish my statement.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to ask a question right here. Does not this bill provide that whoever takes the civil-service examination in this bill within the District of Columbia shall be charged to the District of Columbia?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; it provides on page 2, line 4:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to abridge the existing law of apportionment.

The purpose of that amendment was to cover the cases where the people had lived all their lives in the District that they should be charged back to their district from which their parents came.

Now, I propose an amendment to be added to the proviso after the end of line 5, in these words: "Or change the requirements of the existing law as to legal residence and domicile of such applicant."

Not only is the man who applies in the District of Columbia to be resident of some district, if he is to be charged against his home district, but he ought to have a domicile in that district if he is to be charged up against it. In other words, the concrete example which I have in mind, which confronts every Member of the House, is that the men who are living in the District of Columbia, have been born and raised here, or have lived here so long that they are not attached to any district and do not vote in any congressional district, ought to be charged to the District of Columbia and not to the respective districts from which their parents came.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. If these Government clerks are so underpaid and badly treated as they claim to be, why does anyone want to come from any district, why should it be any attraction to anyone?

Mr. ROBBINS. Oh, that is foreign to what I am trying to discuss. The gentleman enjoys a monopoly upon that theme, and I shall not invade his province.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to know why the gentleman is insisting upon this as a right.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Why does the gentleman favor having other men from his district come down here and become practically aliens from the district and be charged up against the district, rather than to have the children of those who are here, I should think the gentleman would rather keep people at home.

Mr. ROBBINS. I would.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CALDWELL). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to grant me five minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBBINS. What I want to do is this. Take the case of a man who comes here and wishes to enter the Government service. If he wants to take the examination outside of his district, he must not only have a residence in the district but he must be domiciled there also. Then he can be charged up against the district. That is a fair requirement. If these offices are to be filled up and apportioned to the various congressional districts of the Nation, and that is right, then the men who are charged against our districts should be residents of our districts; but that is not enough, because the man that I speak of has a residence in my district, but is not domiciled there. He comes back there every presidential election, and parades up and down, and claims that he carries that district in his pocket, and yet at the same time he is not domiciled there. I want the children of this man, or any other resident who comes here to Washington and who is to be charged against my district and against your district, not only to be a resident of my district or your district but to have a domicile there also. This amendment merely provides for that thing, that they shall not only be residents, but must be domiciled there. I do not happen to have the civil-service act before me, but I have read it in connection with this proposed law, and I want to make that specific provision very clear, and that is the object of this amendment. It does not change the purpose of the bill, but does clinch that fact.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have a great many stenographers who have come up here at the solicitation of the departments, who now have to take civil-service examinations before they can continue permanently in the departments. To return to take the examination would involve a thousand miles of travel. Would the gentleman's amendment affect them?

Mr. ROBBINS. Oh, no. Those people have a residence in the gentleman's district, and a domicile there as well. This amendment strikes only at people who live here in the city of Washington, who have lived here for years, who are the sons of people who have come on from some district or from my district and are charged against those districts, but who have no domicile in the gentleman's district or in mine. I do not think it is right that they should be charged against our districts. The people the gentleman speaks of have a residence and a domicile in his district, and it is proper that they should be charged against the gentleman's district. They must be charged some place.

Mr. LUFKIN. Does the gentleman contend that the children of his constituent who has lived here for 25 years and who has maintained a voting residence back in the district, can go back there and take the civil-service examination as residents of his district?

Mr. ROBBINS. They can not go back there certainly. They have no other residence, but they have no domicile there which the law requires.

Mr. LUFKIN. They must have a domicile there under existing law.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then, they can not go back there.

Mr. LUFKIN. Then, they have to take the examination here, and they must be charged here.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is it exactly.

Mr. LUFKIN. Then, this bill does not change it in the least.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, it does. This amendment I propose prevents them being charged against my district, but they can be charged against the District of Columbia where they have a domicile as well as a residence.

Mr. LUFKIN. There is an amendment proposed here:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to abridge the existing law of apportionment.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is all right as to apportionment, but I want to go further and have this amendment:

That it shall not change the requirements of existing law as to the local residence and domicile of such applicants.

I want "domicile" put in there, because I consider that is an important fact in determining the districts against which applicants shall be charged.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I will.

Mr. FESS. Would the amendment of the gentleman preclude the appointment of anybody who is domiciled here and has no domicile elsewhere?

Mr. ROBBINS. Not at all. They will be appointed from the District of Columbia. It only provides that a man who has a domicile here and a residence here and was born here must be appointed and charged to this district and not to the district from whence his father came and where his father maintains the right to vote.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. What the gentleman's amendment does is to substitute in the civil-service law the word "domicile" for the word "residence."

Mr. ROBBINS. No; I retain both.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman adds the word "domicile."

Mr. ROBBINS. That is the idea. I simply add "domicile" to the word "residence," so that he must be charged to the district where he is both domiciled and resident; having a domicile in the District of Columbia, he must be charged here to the district.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly.

Mr. KEARNS. Take a case where a man comes here from, say, Indiana and who has a position here as a clerk in one of the departments. He and his family have moved here, and he is living here with his family, although he is credited to some district in Indiana——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. ROBBINS. Two minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose one of his children would want to take an examination, and passes a successful examination, and be appointed, would he be credited to the same district?

Mr. ROBBINS. He would have to have a domicile in Indiana, otherwise he would be credited to the District of Columbia.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose this boy wanted to go back to his father's old home or his voting district and vote. Would that estop the boy from voting?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; that does not affect any qualifications for voting. This is not a voting law, this is a civil-service law with reference to the apportionment of the various persons who wish to enter the civil service from the various States.

Mr. KEARNS. I think that is a very important matter.

Mr. ROBBINS. But it does not affect that. Your voting qualification is fixed in the constitution of your State, and nothing Congress could do would in any way impair or curtail or limit that.

Mr. KEARNS. Suppose I certified my domicile and perhaps my residence is here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. ROBBINS. You would have to get your appointment where your domicile and residence are under this bill.

Mr. KEARNS. This boy I was talking about, his domicile would be here if he was credited to the District of Columbia?

Mr. ROBBINS. He would have to get his appointment here.

Mr. KEARNS. Even when he goes to vote in Indiana——

Mr. ROBBINS. That does not affect it. Residence is a question of intention.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I will.

Mr. ROSE. I presume then there are clerks in the employ of the United States Government who have never seen the district from which they are credited for 40 years under the gentleman's statement?

Mr. ROBBINS. Why, there are some of them, I suppose, but I have only this concrete example in mind, because it is unfair to my district, and the working out of this proposition was very unfair in that it filled up the quota of my district with appointments from the District of Columbia to the exclusion of bona fide residents of my district who deserve these places, and that is the reason why I cling so tenaciously to the amendment, which I think should be put in the bill now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to read what is the legal definition of "resident" and "domicile"?

Mr. ROBBINS. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think there has been some contradiction here in the distinction given to the words "domicile" and "residence," respectively, and I invite the attention of the gentleman and the membership of the House to what Bouvier says, in his law dictionary, in defining "residence" and "domicile."

Residence indicates permanancy of occupation as distinguished from lodging, or boarding, or temporary occupation, but does not include so much as domicile which requires an intention continued with residence.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is true.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman to say that the resident was not a man living in a place, but who intends making the place his home. I notice in Bouvier's definition of domicile, he says:

Domicile is that place where a man has true, fixed, and permanent home and principal establishment, and to which whenever he is absent he has the intention of returning.

He also says:

Two things must concur to establish domicile—the fact of residence and the intention of remaining. These two must exist or must have existed in combination.

Mr. ROBBINS. There is no quarrel with that law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How does that agree with the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. ROBBINS. Perfectly, because the amendment only means that a man must have a domicile and residence. He can swear that it is his intention to maintain his residence in Pennsylvania if he works in Washington. This is a temporary place, although he lives here. He can go back there if he is in the Government service. He does not vote here. A residence in Washington does not preclude the elector from exercising his electoral franchise. But domicile is a fact. That is the place where he actually lives and maintains his abode.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand the gentleman to say that the children who are here must have, for instance, a home in your district, to which they must return.

Mr. ROBBINS. If they are to be charged by the Civil Service Commission as coming from my district. It would be manifestly unfair for those who have their domicile or abode here, but never go to my district to be appointed under the civil-service law as coming from and residing in my district. This amendment makes the law clear and specific as to what Congress intends to do, and I hope the amendment may be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not amend this except by unanimous consent.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

The SPEAKER. Who has the floor?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have taken it. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania misconstrues the language of this resolution.

I am for exactly the same thing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] is for, and I would not be in favor of the resolution at all unless it safeguarded the objects he wishes to accomplish. I have no serious objection to his amendment, because it in no way affects the resolution, as it would mean the same thing without as with his amendment. If he would read this resolution, he would find his amendment does not add to it at all. The only thing—as I explained before the gentleman came in—that this resolution does is just simply to provide that a qualified applicant, who must be qualified under the act of 1909 as to residence and domicile, can take the examination in the District of Columbia or any State in which he happens to be without being required to return to his own State in which to take the examination. No right of apportionment under the present law is abridged, according to the expressed provision of the resolution. The qualification of an applicant, so far as his residence and domicile are concerned, remains by the resolution as it is under existing law. He must be both a resident and domiciliary of the State to which he is charged for the 12 months next preceding the date of the examination. Now, this act does not take away from any qualification of the applicant. He must still be a resident and still be a domiciliary of the State to which he is credited for the 12 months next preceding the date of the examination.

And the only thing this does is to permit that qualified applicant, say, of Wisconsin, who has been a domiciliary and actual resident of that State for the 12 months next preceding the date of examination, if he is here, temporarily absent in the district or in another State, to take the examination in the District or such State instead of being required to go back to Wisconsin and take the examination there. But he will be charged or credited to Wisconsin. If he takes it here in the District, he is charged up to Wisconsin and not to the District of Columbia. However, if that applicant had remained here in the District for 12 months, then he would be charged or apportioned to the District. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] is clearly mistaken in assuming that under this resolution an applicant who, coming here, say, from Wisconsin years ago, could take the examination here and be charged to Wisconsin. If he had been here for the 12 months preceding the examination, he would be charged to the District. Therefore, what the gentleman fears could not take place, but if he is serious, and I think he is, in wanting to doubly and specifically safeguard the situation which he fears, I do not object to his amendment, and will therefore ask unanimous consent to let him put that amendment in.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Are you sure that this amendment accomplishes just what he intends? I am not certain as to that.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is the whole purpose I want to reach. I submitted this amendment over the telephone to the Civil Service Commission, because it struck me right away that the danger that we saw in this act was one that was really serious to the apportionment under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, if the gentleman will yield, to have the suggested amendment read for information.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will read it in my time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the statement will be read.

Mr. KITCHIN. After the proviso in the resolution add the words "or change the requirements of existing law as to legal residence and domicile of such applicant."

As the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] knows, I at first made the same objection to the original bill presented before the hearing. After the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service had put in the present amendments I was convinced that the resolution was all right and was not open to the objections made.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will say that the gentleman from North Carolina made practically the same suggestion to me about the resolution prior to the holidays.

Mr. KITCHIN. It makes it all right. Here is what Mr. McIlhenny writes:

Special attention is invited to the fact that the resolution merely proposes to amend that part of the act of July 2, 1909, which requires a person to be examined in the place where he has established his residence, and the other part of the act is to remain in full force and effect which requires that, before a person can be examined anywhere, he must establish actual domicile in the place of his residence.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Wisconsin had some discussion as to the meaning of the word "residence" and of the word "domicile." A gentleman sitting near has given a definition of "domicile" which I think is quite pertinent. A domicile "from" is the place from which he is home, and when "to" he is said to be "to home." [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBBINS. I was starting out a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, to state that I had read this over the telephone to the Civil Service Commission. I would not, of course, offer an amendment to a bill affecting that commission without consulting them. But Mr. McIlhenny thought it was already sufficient. After discussing it, he said he thought it would do no harm, because it simply amplified what it should be.

Mr. KITCHIN. To make doubly sure and to facilitate the passage of the resolution I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman's amendment may go in after the word "apportionment" on the second page.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the amendment be inserted at the proper place. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution as amended.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution embodying the amendments.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the Senate joint resolution was passed.

On motion of Mr. KITCHIN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LEHLBACH, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. BROWNING), was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

CUTTING TIMBER ON COCONINO AND TUSAYAN NATIONAL FORESTS, ARIZ.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to recur to No. 59 on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, H. R. 273. Objection was made before to the consideration of that bill. I now ask that Senate bill 389, an identical bill on the Speaker's table, be considered in lieu of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks what?

Mr. HAYDEN. To return to No. 59 on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to return to No. 59 on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, House bill 273. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not like to consent to take up a bill that I know nothing about. I shall object to consideration. Can not that go over two weeks just as well as not?

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the bill remain on the calendar as it was; that the bill retain its place on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent that the House bill 273 retain its place on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and go over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. At the foot of the calendar.

Mr. FORDNEY. Do not do that. Let it take its place.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I reserve the right to object, unless the Senate bill is different from the House bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. I want the House bill to retain its place on the calendar. Objection was made to it some time ago. I will offer the Senate bill two weeks from to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think it ought to go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects unless it goes to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection with that condition?

There was no objection?

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on H. R. 9159.

Mr. GILLETT. What bill is that?

Mr. SABATH. The naturalization bill which we passed a little while ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS FOX RIVER, ILL.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, on the Unanimous Consent Calendar the next bill is H. R. 7998. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is it on the calendar?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is on the calendar, the next bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. What is it, a bridge bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of of Kansas. A little bridge bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 7998) granting the consent of Congress to the village of East Dundee and the village of West Dundee to construct a bridge across the Fox River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the village of East Dundee and the village of West Dundee, in the county of Kane, in the State of Illinois, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Fox River from Main Street in East Dundee to Main Street in West Dundee, in the county of Kane, in the State of Illinois, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 5, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 5, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God. Thou art the light. In Thee there is no darkness at all. We thank Thee for coming out of the shadows and revealing more and more of Thy will and of Thy nature to man. We thank thee for leading on men and nations in the fulfillment of a divine plan, and that Thy purpose is seen more and more clearly day by day. Thou art shaking the nations that the desirable things may come, and that the things may remain which can not be shaken. We bless God for the coming of His kingdom. We pray Thee to hasten the day for His final victory in all the earth. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Saturday, March 2, 1918, was read and approved.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent by reason of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. I rise to announce the absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] because of personal illness. I also announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is necessarily absent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent by reason of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. The Committee on Banking and Currency is in session, and if the number present is not sufficient to make a quorum I will let them know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

AFFAIRS IN SIBERIA.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have certain telegrams which I am asked to present to the Senate. For reasons satisfactory to me, I do not wish these telegrams put in the RECORD, but I beg the Senate to indulge me for a minute of time that I may state their purport and serve the object of my rising.

Mr. President, these telegrams are from personal acquaintances, some from the Pacific coast and some here from the East, repeating telegrams received by them from Mexico. They disclose a fright, a scare, based upon what they claim to be information coming from the Orient, charging that the United States is in some form of alliance or compact with Japan which permits Japan to enter into Siberia and take possession of that portion of the East without our hindrance, in consideration of the United States "allowing Japan a free hand in the Philippines, permission to establish bases in Mexico, and the allowance of her citizens to come ad libitum to the United States."

Mr. President, it is to be regretted that any such views have been sent forward from any source whatever. Whether they are sent to Mexico to stimulate Mexico in opposition to us, I can only surmise; whether they are sent by the East by agencies who are opposed to us, I can only approximate; but from my position, sir, let me assume to state that there is no ground for such fear as expressed in these messages. There is no alliance between the United States and Japan; there is no compact between the United States and Japan prescribing conditions as to the European war, and no services are being exacted of Japan by the United States in the war, and no arrangement whatever by the United States with Japan as to anything anywhere as a consideration for anything Japan does in this war for the United States.

Let the country understand now, as these reports which we are getting constantly may inflame minds not accustomed to be met with propaganda, that the attitude of Japan in this war is the result of her compact with Great Britain; that Japan has an understanding, an alliance in form, with Great Britain guaranteeing to Britain her services in any manner of assault against the rights of either Japan or Britain, particularly in the East; that whatever Japan is doing she is doing in pursuit of and in obedience to this understanding between herself and Britain; and, I may add, in nowise is the result of any alliance or contract with the United States.

Mr. President, as to emigration or as to Japanese coming in the United States, there is existing between Japan and the United States an arrangement designated as a "gentleman's agreement." This has to do with the question of immigration of the people of the East—of Japanese—into the United States. There is no movement now by our country or Japan to modify that agreement as a condition of any service by Japan in this war, nor is there any understanding consummated and existing at this time for the enlargement of that agreement in anywise whatsoever.

Mr. President, I dare to take it upon myself to say this to the Senate, without regard to any differences of little local political matters sometimes engaging us. I prefer to have certified to the world from this body that the United States under President Wilson will, while it fights for the principles of democracy, under no circumstances allow them to be violated by any agreement on our part with any country anywhere that would lessen the protection we owe to the American citizen, nor would we under the present administration in anywise repeal the policies which have so long preserved America and are necessary to be continued for its perpetuity and preservation.

I thank the Senate for indulging me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if he has any objection to giving the names of the parties who sent the telegrams to which he refers.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the Senator from Washington I personally have no objection, but the senders request that their names be withheld lest they should be put in some disadvantageous position by having them disclosed. That is why I can not put them in the RECORD as requested, because the senders ask to have their names withheld. But for that I would gladly do so. To the Senator or any other Senator, personally, I will exhibit the wires at any time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois, who has made the statement which we have just heard, which apparently purports authoritatively to state the views of the Senate and the policy of the Government about matters in the Orient, whether his statement has been made upon the authority of the State Department or the President, or whether it represents his own views merely?

Mr. LEWIS. First, I wish to say to my eminent friend, the Senator from Connecticut, that when I stated I was sure the Senate would stand as sponsor for the expression of what Wilson stood for, I did not mean, of course, to speak for any Senators who differed from me. I meant to say that our confidence in our own Government and in its President was of the kind that we at this time would not permit the suggestion without some authoritative evidence somewhere that there could be any violation of any established policy. I say to the Senator, therefore, I spoke upon my own authority. I spoke upon my own judgment, upon my knowledge of the affairs of my country, my knowledge of President Wilson, and because I recognize that there can be no compact in the form of an alliance between the United States and any country that does not come to this body for its final consummation. Therefore I naturally assume that the whole Senate would know that such could have no existence, and I assert upon my own authority that it does not have existence.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not knowing what the allegations were in the telegrams which the Senator has referred to but has not seen fit to put in the RECORD, and inasmuch as he thinks it involved rumors of alliances between Japan and Mexico, and the United States and Great Britain being in it, at such a point I would not want the Senator's statement to go forth as having been subscribed to and guaranteed by the Senate of the United States, which is one-half the treaty-making power.

What the facts are in relation to allegations which have not been read, but which are contained in the telegrams which the Senator from Illinois says he has received, I have no knowledge whatever. It seems to me, however, to be a matter of such a delicate nature and so serious in its intendment and possible consequences that I, for one, would not want to sit silent and appear to be giving consent to everything the Senator has said.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I may say, of course, that there are Senators who view our relations, whatever they are, with a little different construction than that which I put upon them, but I put my own construction and assumed that there was hardly any difference as to that construction. If there is any Senator who differs as to the construction of our relations or course, of course he is not bound by an observation of mine.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rise to say that I was so much pleased with the last assurance given by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] just before the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] that, much as I dislike to interrupt discussions between eminent Senators, I desire to call for the regular order.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I ask the Senator from Oklahoma to yield to me for just one instant?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the very delicate subject which has been touched upon by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is one of extraordinary importance to the State from which I come. I do not at all discuss any of the matters that have been suggested by the Senator from Illinois, but, like the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], by mere silence I do not wish at this time to subscribe to aught that has been said in this regard or to any of the matters that are matters now of public rumor concerning the various alliances and the various activities which have been mentioned by the Senator from Illinois.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries within the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash., and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota presented a memorial of the Sunday School of the First Methodist Church of Mitchell, S. Dak., comprising 1,500 members, remonstrating against the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of alcoholic drinks, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The world is cold and hungry because of lack of sufficient fuel and food. Because of this fact the people of the United States are asked to deny themselves many things that have heretofore been considered necessities. At the same time millions of dollars worth of foodstuffs are being destroyed and thousands of tons of coal are being wasted in the manufacture and distribution of malt and brewed liquors: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Sunday School of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Mitchell, S. Dak., this 24th day of February, 1918, That the waste and destruction of fuel and food in the manufacture and distribution of malt and brewed liquors in this time of need are hereby condemned; and be it further

Resolved, That the beer drinkers of America be asked, in the name of patriotism, to deny themselves the harmful luxury of beer drinking; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby earnestly request and urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to do all in their power to secure the speedy enactment of a law that will assist these people in this very useful form of self-denial, and that will fully and effectually prohibit the waste and destruction of fuel and foodstuffs in the manufacture and distribution of malt and brewed liquors in the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

LAURITZ MILLER,
Chairman of Committee.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of sundry railway postal clerks of the Lincoln and Billings Railway Post Office, of Sheridan, Wyo., praying for an increase in the salaries of railway postal clerks, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Labor Council of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the fixing of prices on all necessities of life, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Agricultural appropriation bill be now laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not yet announced the close of morning business. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply wish to make a statement with reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. On yesterday I had temporarily laid aside the war finance corporation bill for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill. I did that not intending to call that bill up any more during the day. I did expect, however, to call it up to-day immediately after the routine morning business. For reasons that I need not now state, I have decided that I will not ask the Senate to take that bill up until after the routine morning business, that is after 2 o'clock. For that reason I am perfectly willing that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill until 2 o'clock. At that time I shall ask that the war finance corporation bill be taken up.

I wish to make this statement primarily because I know a number of Senators have stated to me that they were staying in the Chamber expecting that the war finance corporation bill would be called up. I now give this notice so that until 2 o'clock Senators shall have an opportunity to attend to any other business which they may desire.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the war finance corporation bill is there any doubt about that bill coming up at 2 o'clock?

Mr. SIMMONS. None in the world, so far as I know.

Mr. BORAH. The reason why I ask that question is that I had intended to be away from the Senate to-day, but I do not desire to be absent if the war corporation bill is really coming up.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think there is no doubt about its coming up.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has asked unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first committee amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The first committee amendment passed over at the request of Mr. GRONNA was, on page 13, line 19, after the word "authorities," to strike out the numerals "$250,000" and to insert "$500,000: Provided, That hereafter the act approved May 29, 1884 (23 Stat. L., p. 31), be, and the same is hereby, amended to permit cattle which have reacted to the tuberculin test to be shipped, transported, or moved from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for immediate slaughter, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I asked to have this amendment go over, because it had been suggested to me that the three words "for immediate slaughter" should be stricken out. Upon reflection, I think that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment, that the word "immediate" be stricken out, if adopted will be satisfactory to the members of the committee at least.

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to having the word "immediate" stricken out in the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 1, of the committee amendment, before the word "slaughter," it is proposed to strike out the word "immediate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in some respects the suggestion made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] meets my views more nearly than the original suggestion that the words "for immediate slaughter" be entirely eliminated, yet I am not at all convinced that this is a very safe proceeding. If the word "immediate" is taken out, the provision will mean that tuberculous cattle may be taken from one State to another for slaughter. Taking out the word "immediate" really means substituting the word "eventual." There would be no limitation as to how long such cattle might be permitted to live, and I fear that they will spread the disease. They might be kept two or three years in the hands of the man who has received them, and he might say "they are going to be killed sometime."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from New York will notice the amendment, it provides that the shipment can only be made "in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture." The objection to having the word "immediate" inserted seemed to be almost universal when we had the matter up yesterday, and that was that it would subject the owner of the cattle to the mercy, perhaps, of the packers; that the cattle would have to be sold, and sold at once, and it might be advantageous to a party to keep them a while and wait over a day or two for a better market or something of that kind, so as not to put the owner of the cattle absolutely at the mercy of the buyer at that particular point.

It seems to me that the department, under proper rules and regulations, could certainly prevent these cattle being held any length of time, and leaving in the word "slaughter" would absolutely prevent them from being shipped for any other purpose, so that they could not be used for milch cows or for breeding purposes or for anything of that kind.

It seemed to be the opinion of most of those who were present the other day that to require the cattle to be slaughtered immediately would impose such a harsh rule that it might result in a great deal of hardship.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the provision for immediate slaughter is not at all new in the legislative history of the country. A large number of the States compel immediate slaughter, and one of the amendments now pending to this bill, may I say to the Senator from Nebraska, provides that in the event of immediate slaughter the Federal Government shall pay something like one-third of the value to the owner, which is a good deal more drastic treatment than even the very wicked packers would accord to a tuberculous cow.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the cattle that have tuberculosis are almost invariably dairy cattle. They become infected with the disease by being constantly housed and fed a very rich ration. They are not out doors as much as cattle upon the range. The disease is scarcely known in the far Western States. It is found in the dairy States, and when a dairy cow has become infected with tuberculosis her value for beef is rather slight in any event.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. As the Senator from New York knows, this whole amendment was prepared by the Agricultural Department, but the original amendment did not contain the words "for immediate slaughter."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Those words were left out of the original amendment; I know that.

Mr. GRONNA. It is not in any sense of the word my amendment at all, but it has been suggested to me that it would be a hardship in many cases upon those who buy stock to have this drastic language in the amendment. Inasmuch as the Secretary of Agriculture will have the right to prescribe rules and regulations governing the shipment of these cattle, I thought perhaps there would be no objection to permitting the buyer of perhaps expensive cattle to fit his cattle for market as well as it could possibly be done. I shall not, however, insist on the amendment, if the Senator from New York thinks that it is objectionable.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I know that the amendment originally came from the Department of Agriculture; that it was sent to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; and that the committee itself, or a majority of it, insisted that the words "for immediate slaughter" be inserted in the language prepared by the department officials. The committee took that ground because without those words the amendment would constitute an entire reversal of the legislative and governmental policy of the country with respect to interstate commerce in diseased animals.

I wish I had entire confidence that rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture could follow these cattle wherever they went and stay by them every day and every night; but that can not be done. The disease is transmitted by contact, and to make the keeping of such cattle absolutely safe they have to be watched all the time. It is necessary to place absolute trust in the owner that he will not let them be stabled with healthy cattle. I doubt whether rules and regulations, no matter how honestly contrived or how earnestly the attempt is made to enforce them, can provide for following and watching the cattle in all circumstances.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that such cattle are now shipped in intrastate commerce, and I suppose that the rules and regulations in force to prevent the spread of the disease in intrastate business might also be applied to interstate shipments. The purpose of slaughter is not at all affected by this amendment, and I suppose whatever safeguards are now employed to prevent the spread of the disease in a State may be applied to prevent its spread across the boundaries of States and undoubtedly that ought to be done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator says that these cattle are now shipped in intrastate business, apparently with no rules and regulations. That applies only to those States that are careless about this proposition. There are some States that have the most rigid laws, enacted in a desperate effort to stamp out this disease, and those States that have such laws do not permit the shipment intrastate of tubercular cattle except for immediate slaughter. Now, this is a proposal to endanger those States that have made this fight against tuberculosis by handing over the entire problem to Federal inspectors, whose duty it will be—and, in my judgment, it will be an impossible duty—to follow such cattle wherever they go and watch them to see that they never come in contact with the healthy cattle in States that are trying to stamp out the disease. I think it is a dangerous proceeding.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New York has had an opportunity to investigate this matter; I have not. I want to ask the Senator if, after the tuberculin test has been applied and the reaction occurs, is the animal free from the possibility of becoming diseased?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. I judge not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The tuberculin test does not involve the question which the Senator raises. The tuberculin test is applied to cattle to determine whether or not they have tuberculosis.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not make them immune.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it does not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is simply an aid to a proper diagnosis.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all. So that it would be safe, the Senator thinks, to have such cattle transported without the provision "for immediate slaughter" and allow them to come in contact with other cattle?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If they are transported for immediate slaughter under rules and regulations prescribed by the Federal Government they can be kept away from contact with other cattle. They will be shipped in cars by themselves, and when they reach the stockyards they will be put in pens by themselves and will be slaughtered within 24 hours after they arrive. Then there is no more danger. In a goodly portion of the carcass, in many cases, is good beef, depending upon the progress that the tuberculosis has made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Such cattle are sometimes used for beef even when diseased, to a limited extent. Is that the idea?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To a limited extent. The Government inspectors are in every slaughterhouse and they throw out the beef that is bad and admit the beef that is good.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, of course the Senator knows that the same rule he has just explained would apply in case the shipment was deferred.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but during that interval, while the shipment is deferred, I doubt if the Federal Government can watch these cattle.

Mr. GRONNA. That may be true. I believe, however, we can let the matter go to conference, and, if the Senator then shall have any objection, the conference committee may take out the provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. KENYON. Let the amendment be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 1, before the word "slaughter," it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "immediate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, an amendment that was suggested yesterday has been perfected, and I now send it to the desk and ask for its adoption.

Mr. GORE. I suggest that the committee amendment be first acted upon.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment I propose is an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Wyoming offers an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is in order, and will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 19, after the numerals "$500,000," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That in carrying out the purpose of this appropriation, destruction of tuberculous animals becomes necessary, there may be paid from this appropriation not more than one-third the net loss to the owner, and in no event shall there be paid more than $20 for any grade or $50 for any pure-bred animal so destroyed, or a sum greater than one which combined with the sum paid by the cooperating State, or municipality, equals the value of the animal destroyed.

Mr. WARREN. That amendment refers to the entire paragraph preceding, and comes in after the insertion of the numerals "$500,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to determine. Those in favor of the amendment will rise. [A pause.] Those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, after the word "Provided," in line 19, I think the word "further" should be inserted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, do I understand that the words "for immediate slaughter," on line 1, page 14, are still in the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are still in the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not have my papers here, nor a letter I received from the Agricultural Department concerning these words "for immediate slaughter." I think there was very little discussion in the committee about that matter. I do not believe it is very well understood now. The Agricultural Department are very strongly of the opinion that those words should go out.

There are two phases of that. Nobody wants to spread tuberculosis, of course, among cattle; but there are instances of this kind among blooded cattle that are shipped from one State to another: One may have a pedigreed bull that is of great value. When it gets to the other State it may respond to this tuberculin test. There is no way then to bring it back to the owner or to the party who may have sold it, but it must be immediately killed. Now, it could be brought back under the regulations of the Department of Agriculture, and, under the system which they designate, I think, as the Bang system, with absolute protection against the spread of the disease. That animal can be brought back and used in developing the herd. Tuberculosis in cattle is not handed down by heredity; it comes from contact; so that these animals that may have it, and may respond to the tuberculin test, are serviceable for breeding purposes. The herd of cattle at the Soldiers' Home here, I understand, was entirely developed from that class of cattle; and there are other instances of the kind which I might narrate.

I think the words "for immediate slaughter" ought to go out. I think the matter will be safe enough in the regulations which the Department of Agriculture will establish. At a later time I shall put in the RECORD the letter I received from the department along that line, with the hope that the conference committee may consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] stated that tuberculosis is not handed down by heredity. Do cattle occupy a different position from human beings in that regard? Medical investigation and medical conviction are most clear that tuberculosis is in a sense a hereditary disease, and is handed down.

Mr. KENYON. As to cattle, it is only produced by contact. It is not handed down by heredity, so the experts of the Department of Agriculture say.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The life insurance companies reject the children of persons who have had tuberculosis.

Mr. KENYON. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And unquestionably there is at least a physical condition attached which is handed down, and makes the disease probable.

Mr. KENYON. I understand so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And my vote for the immediate slaughter was because I am very anxious that they shall not send any of that class of animals into my immediate section, or anywhere.

Mr. KENYON. So am I. I agree with the Senator entirely as to that, but under the Bang system they can be transported with no danger of contagion.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, responding to the inquiry, I will say that there has been great study over the question whether the disease of tuberculosis is not transmitted through the milk of the cows, and in that way transmitted from the animals to the human race. It is true that doctors disagree, but I think the predominating opinion of to-day—and it has been going that way of late years—is that it can be communicated through the milk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, the committee proposes to strike out lines 20 to 25, all of pages 28 and 29, and down to and including line 9 on page 30, with reference to the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds. The amendment was passed over at the request of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for me to take the time of the Senate this morning to discuss the action of the Senate committee upon this particular item. For a number of years past the Agricultural Committee of the Senate has taken the position that it has taken in this bill, by striking out the provision to purchase and distribute valuable seeds to the people of the United States.

As far as I am personally concerned, Mr. President, years past I have recognized that there was an evil in the distribution of seed as the seed was usually distributed; but of late, Mr. President, the seed that go into my State—and I have heard other Sena ors say the same thing—go principally to the schools of the State. The distribution has had a wonderful influence during the last three or four years upon the children of the schools. It has created in them a desire to plant, and see the fruit of the seeds grow, and gather the products produced from their efforts; and the good that has resulted can hardly be estimated and can not be counted in dollars and cents.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am in sympathy with the argument the Senator is making, although in the committee I voted to strike out the provision, and I have always voted to strike it out since I have been in Congress. But if we want to do what the Senator suggests has been done in Utah, and what, as far as I have been able to bring it about, especially since the war has been on, has been done in my State, then we ought to provide by law for doing that thing.

This provision does not do it. This is the same old provision that turns these seeds over to Members of Congress. If we are going to handle seeds in that way, there is not any use of putting them up in small packages and putting the individual Congressman's frank and name on them, and sending them to the schools. We ought to do it directly.

I think that at least while the war is on and we are anxious to increase production I would support an amendment along the lines the Senator has suggested; but does he not think that if we want to do that we ought to take the direct course, and do it directly instead of leaving it as it is, when, as a matter of fact there probably will be very few instances where the schools will get them? They will only get a small portion of them, anyway. If we want to appropriate for seeds to go to the school children, then, it seems to me, we ought to authorize the sending of these seeds by the Agricultural Department directly, without the intervention of Members of Congress or Members of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is a good deal of wisdom in the statement that has been made by the Senator from Nebraska; but I think that this, of all times, is a time when seed should be generally distributed, and thus increase the production of food. I have had this year ten times the number of requests that seed be sent to individuals that I have ever had before since I have been in the Senate of the United States; and some of the letters state that the writers would not ask for the distribution of the seeds if they could buy them in their home towns.

Mr. KENYON. Why can they not buy them?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that in many sections of the country it is impossible to purchase the seed that it has been possible to in years past. The prices have soared so high and generally the amount of seed in the hands of the distributors of this country is so limited that it has not reached to the farther ends of the country, and in many places it is absolutely impossible to buy seed. If we are going to prevent the distribution of seed, let us do so at some time when it will not have so detrimental an effect upon the food production of the United States.

I know it may be said, Mr. President, that the same plea has been made in years past, that "now is not the time to do it." I can not say that I ever made that excuse, because I have believed, since the seeds have been used by the schools of my State, at least, that the distribution ought to continue. I think once or twice I have voted against the further distribution of seed, but I have changed my mind after I have seen the result of the policy that I have adopted, and I think the Congressmen of Utah generally have, of distributing these seeds not so much to individuals as to organizations, those organizations having the responsibility placed upon them to see that they are used in the proper way.

Mr. President, I do not want to take any more of the time of the Senate now, but I felt that now, of all times, we ought at least to distribute these seeds to the schools and to the individuals who really will write and ask for them, because I am quite sure that the effect will be beneficial, not only to those that receive the seeds but to all of the people of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, there are women's garden clubs now in every State that are asking for these seeds, that are devoting their time to using them, and I think they occupy an entirely different position from the position they occupied a few years ago.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right; and I want to say to the Senator that in many of the States some of the leading papers have started a campaign for garden-truck raising. I know that last year one of the leading papers in Ogden started that propaganda, and seed was sent them from here, all that I could spare. I made a special request of the department to send additional seed to them, and I was happy to read the report of what had happened in that district from the distribution of these seeds.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, unlike the Senator from Utah, I have always believed in the distribution of these seeds, and I have believed in it on account of the enormous production and the enormous improvement that arises from transplanting even common seed from one portion of the country to a distant portion of the country. There has been a development in agriculture, by reason of the wide-spread distribution of seed, that has been perfectly immense. When we realize the fact that all of the 3,500 varieties of apples came from the original crab, we realize that it means simply cultivation, transplanting; it means the sowing of seed under certain climatic conditions in one portion of the country and under entirely different climatic conditions in another. That alone is of immense value in improving the various varieties.

It is well known that the peach tree, which now yields 500 varieties of the most delicious fruit in the world, came originally from simply a bush that was thought to be poisonous; and, in fact, the peach seed now contains a bitterness that somewhat resembles the original taste. Those conditions arose from transplanting not necessarily fine seeds or rare seeds, but ordinary seeds, from one portion of the country to the other. You may take, also, any number of the fruits that are now being raised.

We have an illustration of that in Colorado in the Rocky Ford melon. It was not raised from a special seed; it was seed that drifted there from one place or another, and any distribution of seed produces that condition. It fell upon a peculiarly favorable soil in a very favorable climate, and it has produced a melon that is perfectly wonderful and is known throughout the entire world, as shipments are made to various portions of the entire United States; and the same thing is true of many of the other fruits.

Now, that probably can not be traced to these particular seeds that are sent out by Congress, but that is an element. The seed so distributed from various portions of the United States must of necessity find a lodgment somewhere in a way that produces a different variety. That being the case, it seems to me it is an encouragement in the line of progress which has been going on by reason of the distribution of seed. The conditions which the Senator from Utah has described magnify the importance of this appropriation. They make it so that now there will be more attention paid to the seed.

It may be said that this is somewhat of a political distribution, but that is not true. I do not believe there is a single Senator who picks out a particular line of people to whom to send seeds. He generally sends them through organizations of some kind, or else he asks them to give the seeds to people that can use them. The distribution is not in any way political. Nobody thinks of the political affiliations of the man who writes for seeds. These conditions, it seems to me, make as fair a distribution as can be devised, because each Senator and each Representative gets his allotment, irrespective of politics.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to encourage the planting of seed, and when we consider what an enormous amount is produced from a little seed we can readily see that even if only a small portion of them are planted great results must follow. It may be that the seed houses do not like it, but that is not any reason why there should not be a benefit and an encouragement given to the people, especially at this time, when we need the production and are in every way facilitating the increase of agriculture.

It seems to me, therefore, that the House provision ought to remain in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the general proposition of the distribution of seed. I wish simply to say that if the Senate disagrees to the committee amendment and thereby restores the language of the House bill involving a general congressional distribution of seed, I shall offer an amendment, and beg the Senate to adopt it, limiting the seed to food-producing seed. I am not yet convinced that the distribution of geraniums, tulips, hyacinths, and crocus is going to help win the war.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am going to offer an amendment and have the Senate vote on it. I move, on page 28, line 22, commencing after the words "United States," to strike out all down to and including the word "Departments," in line 24, on page 29, and to insert the language I send to the Secretary's desk. That, I will say to the Senate, leaves the purchase of seeds in the bill, but takes out that part of the amendment which gives to Members of the House of Representatives and Senators a quota, and authorizes them to send out the seed, and puts in lieu of that language that which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all from page 28, line 22, after the words "United States," down to and including the word "Departments," in line 24, on page 29, and to insert:

Such seed shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture to schools, societies, associations, and individuals under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If I have the same print the Senator from Nebraska is reading from, he is offering to strike out something that has already been stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee to strike out has not yet been adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment of the committee seeks to strike out certain language from the House text. It is proper at this stage and it is the proper time, I think, to move to amend the House text in any way that we may see fit. I am proposing to strike out by my amendment a portion of the House text, including other language. In other words, before we vote on striking out and before we vote on the Senate committee amendment we have a right to perfect the committee amendment and also the House text. My amendment seeks to strike out a part of the language of the House bill and put in other language; in other words, to change it, so that it takes precedence over the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator proposes to perfect the text before we vote on the motion to strike out.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; that is just what I am trying to do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss this matter, but I ask to have the letter I send to the desk read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

CLOVERLAND, WASH., February 12, 1918.

W. L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As secretary of Cloverland Grange, No. 595, of Cloverland, Wash., have been instructed to express the voice of the members of above-said grange relative to this so-called free distribution of garden seeds.

We consider it an imposition of the public from the fact that they are not free as you would have the people believe. As we as taxpayers have to bear this unnecessary burden, and all the members that have received the seeds have been instructed to return them, thus strengthening our voice on the above subject.

Yours, truly,

IRENE JOHNSON,
Secretary Cloverland Grange.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire where this remarkable document is from?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it is from Cloverland, Wash. The letter was presented by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad to hear the letter. It is the most remarkable indication of an awakening of the public conscience on throwing away the public money upon a lot of garden seed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought it would be a rare contribution.

Mr. THOMAS. It looks like an oasis in the desert.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to discuss the amendment briefly.

As I said before, I have been opposed to this congressional distribution of seeds for many years. However, I concede that if there ever was a time in the history of the country when it was justifiable it is perhaps now. That justification, however, does not go to the point, in my judgment, of dividing up these seeds among Members of Congress.

Two years ago, I think it was, I offered an amendment in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry striking out the provision and inserting in lieu a provision permitting the Secretary of Agriculture to distribute these seeds and to send them to anyone who made a request for them. I was opposed to the entire provision, but we have had this experience year after year. The Senate, with one or two exceptions, for a great many years has stricken this out of the bill; it goes to the House and they refuse to concur in the amendment; it then goes to conference, and it is put back in the bill. That has been the experience. There has not been an Agricultural appropriation bill in the last 15 years that has not contained this congressional seed distribution when it was finally enacted into law. I offered that amendment on the floor of the Senate afterwards and it was voted down. It was voted down principally, I think, because Members of the Senate, like myself, were opposed to the entire matter. I did it on the theory that we had better get something than go into conference and get nothing, as we have always been doing.

The amendment which I have offered leaves the appropriation in the bill, and the machinery, as far as the department is concerned, is left in the bill. The same amount of seeds will be purchased, but it will not be turned over to Members of Congress. Under the provisions of the amendment the Secretary of Agriculture, under such rules and regulations as he shall determine, will send the seeds to schools, societies, associations, and individuals. It seems to me that it frees the question of the objections that have always been made, and I think with a great deal of merit, that this was just a little petty graft on the part of Congress. I do not charge that it is. I am assuming that Members of Congress are distributing the seeds in good faith, but that is the impression; that is the belief. No one denies but that the great bulk of these seeds when they are sent out, as they are, promiscuously to people are never planted. It is a waste of money; and as that letter——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment to the Senator. As the letter the Senator from Washington had read shows it is not a free distribution. It is not getting something for nothing. It costs just as much in this way as any other way to get these seeds. It can not be done for nothing. We are not saving any money by dividing the seeds among Members of Congress and having them send them out. Now I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I arose to ask the Senator to give me the source of his information that these seeds are not planted. My experience and observations in the matter lead me to an entirely different conclusion from that which the Senator has stated. The people to whom I have sent seeds have planted them, and I have had applications for probably twice as many seeds as were allotted to me by the Agricultural Department for distribution.

It is my judgment that if the Agricultural Department should do its duty in the matter of selecting seeds it would be an unwise economy to discontinue the distribution. I realize, of course, that the value of the system or the policy of the Government distributing depends largely upon the character of the seeds selected and distributed. If the Agricultural Department is sending out good seeds, seeds that will increase the yield per acre of the crop and enlarge the total production of the entire country, whatever money may be spent by the Government in that way will prove a most profitable investment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator or the Member of the House who sends seeds out does not send them simply to men who make requests for them. If that was done then they would be used properly. Under the amendment I have offered, if it is agreed to, anyone wanting seeds by making a request of the Secretary of Agriculture will be able to get them. Each Member of the Senate, for instance has 20,000 packages of seeds; I believe somewhere in that neighborhood. No matter how careful he may be he must necessarily send them out more or less promiscuously, and there are lots of them that are not planted. I think almost every Member of the Congress has numerous instances brought to his attention where the seeds have not been used. The Senator's experience is different, I think, from the average if all the people to whom he has sent seeds have planted them.

The Senator asked me the question as to where I got the idea. Now, I am going to give him an actual illustration. Seven or eight years ago when I was in the House of Representatives and came down here with my family I rented my home and a tenant lived in it for a year, I think. When we got back into the house one of the things we found was a whole lot of congressional seeds bearing the frank of a Representative from our State. The tenant not only had those packages there in the kitchen but he had another bunch of seeds, the packages unopened, bearing the frank of one of the Senators from our State. I am not accusing the men who send the seeds. They did their duty probably, but I have felt that it was my duty to send them out, although there may be a question about that. However, there are thousands of instances of that kind. If you could go through the country after the seed distribution is made you would find thousands of instances where the seed is simply thrown away.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield. You will find this, too, that if this amendment is agreed to, everyone who wants Government seeds and will go to the pains of writing a letter can get them, and, as far as he is concerned, get them free. That is still left in the bill. It is not interfered with. It takes it away from the Representatives and Senators and that is something that ought to be taken away from them. It does not pertain to any of their official duties to look after these matters. Now, I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to call the Senator's attention, and that of the Senator from Mississippi also, to the fact that in the urgent deficiency bill there is an appropriation of $4,000,000 to be used as a revolving fund for the purchase of seeds where it is essential to send them out. That ought to be sufficient. I shall support the Senator's amendment, because it is better than the original amendment, but the whole thing of sending out these seeds has come to be a howling farce.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course, I do not know whether the American people regard it as a howling farce or not. It is a custom which has prevailed for a great many years. It has stood the test of trial; the American people have at least expressed tacitly their approval of the farce; and since they are to pay the expenses of the farce, and they want the farce, and the farce has been beneficial to them, I am not inclined to relieve them of the benefits of the farce.

A gentleman said to me a moment ago—a Member of the other House—and it recalls the fact that I have received a great many letters in which the same statement is made to me, "If you have them, send me the character of seeds, the variety, that you sent me last year"—radishes or some other vegetable. There may be a great many instances where they are thrown in the waste basket—I do not know about that—but if the Government of the United States, through the Secretary of Agriculture, can distribute over the country an improved variety of seeds from which there will grow plants that will increase the yield to the farmer, it is, I repeat, a wise economy; it is a good investment.

In answer to the suggestion that the Government has appropriated $4,000,000 to be used to buy seeds for the farmers, that, of course, is to meet this war emergency. It is a war measure, and I approve it most heartily. I do not know that any of that seed to be distributed will go to the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent—I think the people there are pretty well supplied—but evidence has doubtless been brought to the attention of Congress or the Senate that seeds are needed, and I think it prudent to make the appropriation to meet the demands.

I want to say that I very much prefer that these seeds should be distributed through the Secretary of Agriculture. It would relieve me as a Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I suppose the Senator will support my amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. So far as I am personally concerned it would be agreeable to me. I should like to be relieved of the labor of distributing the seeds, but the present method has been in vogue so long that I see no necessity for a change. A great many people who want the seeds will receive them under the present system or method of distribution who would not know how to get them if the Senate should adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on several former occasions I have taken exceptions to the action of the Senate committee in striking out this provision, but my mind remains unchanged on the subject. I was attracted by the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska that Senators and Representatives in Congress are sometimes accused of practicing petty graft in sending out these seeds. It is inconceivable to me that any Representative in either House of Congress would make any political capital by sending out a few seeds. More likely he would be criticized by those who did not get them.

I make use of the seeds that I get. In one sense it is immaterial whether I get them or not. It is my habit to send them largely to schools. I have sent more than one-half the quota this year to schools. I commenced that a few years ago, and I know they have been planted, and the results have been very satisfactory. In addition to that I am getting many letters every day, and I have reason to believe that by the time planting comes around all the seeds sent by me for distribution will be distributed to people who really want them and who will use them.

The objections I have to the Senator's amendment is that the Secretary of Agriculture might not act as wisely as I have done in sending the seeds to schools. I have written to the head masters and superintendents of schools over the State asking if a movement of that kind might not be inaugurated to advantage, and we have got their cooperation.

Undoubtedly there is a great deal of waste in this matter, just as there is in the Agricultural Yearbook. I sent out 800 copies of the Yearbook of last year, and I did not get a single reply from the men to whom I sent them. I did not write letters, but I sent them through the mail, and I presume that a very large portion of those will be found in the kitchen or on a shelf somewhere or down cellar, and not read; but that is no reason why we should abolish the printing of the Agricultural Yearbook.

So this is at best but a trifling matter, and the fact that the Government has recognized its necessity to the extent of appropriating $4,000,000 in another bill, indicates that the $200,000, more or less, that we have been in the habit of appropriating year by year must have been a wise action on the part of Congress, because the Government is now recognizing it to the extent of appropriating $4,000,000. I have little hope that the amendment offered by the Senate committee will be defeated, but I know just as well as the Senator from Nebraska knows that this provision will appear in the law, beyond a question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to take this occasion to commend the course which has been taken by the Senator from New Hampshire in the distribution of seeds. This amendment simply perfects that proposition, as I understand it. In my weak way I have tried to do the same thing, and I found cooperation. I find it this year. I have made arrangements to send these seeds mostly to schools, and, as a rule, they have organized.

I can see how that would not only assist in producing food, which we are all anxious to assist in producing, but it would cultivate in the minds of the children where they have cooperative gardens or school grounds or vacant lots ideas of economy and ideas of agriculture which will result in good. But, Mr. President, do we want to do that now—something that we command directly by law—or do we want to say that 20,000 packages of seed shall be given to each Member of the Senate and to each Member of the House of Representatives, and that they may send them out as they please? There are very few Members of Congress who will do as the Senator from New Hampshire has done. The great bulk—I think the great majority—of these packages are absolutely wasted, and that is a loss that we ought to avoid, especially in these times.

This amendment, as I have before stated, does not take away the appropriation; it does not take away any of the seed; but it takes the control away from Members of Congress and puts it where it ought to be, I think, in the hands of the Agricultural Department. I commend the provision in the other bill, which has been mentioned by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from New Hampshire, appropriating $4,000,000 for seed. I expect to support it, though I would not support it every year. This, however, is a year when I shall support it gladly. This amendment will have a tendency to put what were known as congressional seeds in that same class. It will be found, if Senators read the provisions of that bill, that it does not divide the seeds up among Members of Congress to be distributed by them as is provided under this provision. To get the best results, then we ought when the bill appropriating $4,000,000 comes before the Senate, to amend it so as to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture shall divide the seeds up among Members of Congress.

I do not suppose there is a Member of either House who would think for a moment of suggesting that; but that is what we do with this $243,000, which we are appropriating in this bill, if the bill as it came from the House remains unamended.

I do not care to discuss the matter any further, Mr. President; but I should like to have a roll-call vote on this amendment, as I presume there will be a roll-call vote on the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, several Senators have asked me to make a point of no quorum in case this matter came to a vote, as they desired to be present. So I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Swanson
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Thomas

Mr. GONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the demand seconded?

Mr. VARDAMAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Are we about to vote on the amendment to the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Nebraska?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending amendment. The question is on seconding the request for the yeas and nays. [A pause.] The Chair can not grant the yeas and nays, the number of Senators requesting them not being sufficient. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I offer the amendment to the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 22, after the word "valuable," it is proposed to insert "food producing"; on page 28, line 8, after the word "valuable," to insert "food producing"; on page 28, line 14, before the word "seeds," to strike out "and flower"; and on page 30, line 7, after the word "valuable," to insert "food producing" and on page 30, line 8, after the word "valuable," to insert "food producing," so as to read:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable food-producing seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $242,320. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable food-producing seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, after due advertisement and on competitive bids, is authorized to award the contract for the supplying of printed packets and envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, or any part thereof, for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year, if by such action he can best protect the interests of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided, also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided, also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided, also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable food-producing seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable food-producing trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think the object of the amendment which I have sent to the desk is plain. It is simply to confine the distribution of seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, and cuttings to those which can be of economic use to the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the first part of the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 22, after the word "valuable," it is proposed to insert the words "food-producing," so as to read:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable food-producing seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will not the Senator put in the word "and" after the word "seeds," so that it will read "food-producing seeds and"?

Mr. WADSWORTH. "Food-producing seeds and bulbs"?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; bulbs are hardly food producing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not see why that amendment should be adopted. The distribution of seeds this year will be made exactly as it has been made in the past, and the adoption of this amendment may restrict the distribution to certain kinds of seeds. I can not see why the Senator offers the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will endeavor to explain, Mr. President. Here in the Senate we have heard of the great value to the country, and particularly to the rural districts, of the distribution of seed, and a certain amount of money is appropriated by this item for that purpose, amounting, I think, to $243,000. The item as it now reads permits the distribution not only of vegetable seeds, but also of flower seeds. I humbly submit that at this time if it is necessary, as it has been contended, to supply more seeds to the farmers, we should confine them to seeds that will produce food. I can not understand why anybody at this time, in view of the situation, should insist that there be sent out the usual quota of geranium seeds or hyacinth bulbs or tulips and pansies, buttercups, or daisies, or whatever they may be. We are not going to win the war with such things. My suggestion is that the distribution be confined to seeds that will be of some real value. It may be that the suggestion is unorthodox, but I submit it for the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to determine. Those in favor of the amendment to the amendment will rise. [A pause.] Those opposed to the amendment will rise. [A pause.] The amendment to the amendment is rejected. The question recurs on the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. GORE. I wish to give notice that that amendment will be renewed in the Senate, and I will then ask for a record vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division is called for.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment of the committee strikes out the seed provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those in favor of the amendment striking out the provision for the distribution of seed will rise.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the action of the committee strikes the provision from the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair stated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood the Chair to say "those in favor of the provision as to seeds will rise."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair stated, and thought distinctly, that the question was on striking out, according to the committee amendment, the provision for the distribution of seed. Those in favor of agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee will rise and be counted. [A pause.] Those opposed to the amendment will rise and be counted. [A pause.] The amendment reported by the committee is lost. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 46, where it is proposed to strike out the paragraph beginning with line 8, as follows:

Whenever, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that the expenses of travel can be reduced thereby, he may, in lieu of actual traveling expenses, under such regulations as he may prescribe, authorize the payment of not to exceed 2 cents per mile for a motorcycle or 6 cents per mile for an automobile, used for necessary travel on official business in the Forest Service: Provided, That there shall be no payment of mileage for the use or travel of motorcycle or automobile furnished or owned by or maintained by the Government of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that this amendment go over because the Senator having the bill in charge happened to be temporarily absent from the Chamber and there was nobody in the Chamber to explain why the committee adopted the amendment.

It seems to me that by striking out this proviso we open the door for undue charges for the use of automobiles or motorcycles in the forest reserves; and the proviso, as I stated yesterday, is the wording that has been adopted in most of our appropriation acts. I can not see why the action of the committee should be sustained. I think that the provision as put in the bill by the House is a protection against extortionate charges by employees of the Government who happen to use an automobile or a motorcycle belonging to themselves. The charge is limited by the House provision, and I do not think the amount named in the bill is an excessive one; but I do believe that there ought to be a limitation. I therefore hope that this amendment will be defeated, unless some adequate explanation of it can be made by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, this provision, of course, was inserted by the House. Some time ago rules and regulations were adopted which provided for the payment of from 2 to 6 cents a mile to officers in the Forestry Service for the use of their own cars. That was afterwards modified so that the payment could only equal the cost of operation. That, I understand, is the rule and regulation now. The committee was rather under the impression that officers who are already in the employ of the Government, and who had their own machines, probably ought to be required to operate them, as they are now required to operate them, at cost. When you permit these officers to charge from 2 to 6 cents a mile it is a pretty high charge for running their own cars in their own business. We thought it might possibly lead to abuse. The department evidently thought so or they would not have adopted the subsequent regulation, although I am not familiar with the history of the change limiting it to the cost of operation.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to say that the employees of the Government are charging 2 cents a mile for using a motorcycle for their own purposes?

Mr. GORE. That is not true now; no, sir. They are limited now to the cost of operation. Under a previous order, though, officers of the Forestry Service did charge and were paid for operating their own motorcycles and automobiles in the public service. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry rather thought that ought to be stopped, or at least not reauthorized.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am fearful that under the present law, limiting it to actual cost, the charge will exceed 2 cents a mile for a motorcycle or 6 cents a mile for an automobile; and the House provision is that that charge can only be made in case they are traveling on official business of the Forest Service. The Senator knows that wherever a man is traveling in the forests, in the mountains, uphill and downhill, the wear and tear of his automobile and the cost of oil and gasoline are going to amount to at least 6 cents a mile; and if you allow the actual cost to be charged there is no telling what the amount claimed might be. One man will say that the cost is so much per mile, and another man will say it is so much per mile. One will figure in the wear and tear of his machine, and another will not; and there will be no stable price charged or allowed for such travel.

Mr. GORE. If there is any justification at all for such a charge on the part of such officers, the charge certainly ought to equal the cost of operation.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. GORE. We have authorized the purchase of a number of automobiles, and it has been the policy of the Government heretofore to pay for them, and I suppose they have a good many on hand now. This seems to be in addition and supplemental to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator that the charge should not be more than the actual cost; but I believe that if the House provision is stricken out we will never pay for only the actual cost. I think some will put in a bill for more than the actual cost, and perhaps some less. I think it would be very much better to state specifically what the Government will pay. If this is too much, lower the price; but let us have a fixed price that all will know what to charge.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that the Comptroller of the Currency, as I am now informed, has ruled that the department had no authority to pay more than the cost of operation.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the law?

Mr. GORE. Under the law.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GORE. For that reason the practice of paying them so much a mile was stopped, and they are limited now to the cost of operation.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand, Mr. President, the law is now that they shall pay the actual cost, and, of course, under that law the comptroller could rule in no other way; but this is an amendment to that as far as the Forest Service is concerned. I believe that the House provision is a wise one and ought to be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over will be found on page 61, and was passed over at the instance of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. The committee proposes to insert on line 14, after the word "birds," the words "and any act of Congress to give effect to the treaty with Great Britain relating to migratory birds," so that, if amended, the paragraph will read:

For all necessary expenses for enforcing the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., 847, 848), relating to the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds, and any act of Congress to give effect to the treaty with Great Britain relating to migratory birds, and for cooperation with local authorities in the protection of migratory birds, and for necessary investigations connected therewith, $50,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, yesterday I made a statement in relation to this amendment, based upon information that I had received just before I made the statement which I find is not altogether correct. The treaties between Great Britain and this country relating to migratory birds have been agreed to by both countries; but there is a bill that passed the Senate giving effect to these treaties, and it is now in the House of Representatives, and has not passed the House, although it passed the Senate. I believe that this amendment is a good one and ought to be adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator from Utah that the treaty was made in December, 1916; but while the treaty made all necessary provision for the protection of migratory birds, of course it carried no appropriation with it, and none of the rules and regulations by which the conditions of the treaty are to be carried out. It seems to me that we ought not to wait to take a chance with the bill before the House, but that it may as well be placed in this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over will be found at the foot of page 92, where the committee proposes to insert the following paragraph, beginning on line 21——

Mr. GORE. I will ask that the substitute which I sent to the desk be read in lieu of the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not informed where the substitute sent up by the Senator is.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the committee amendment first be read, and then we will better understand the substitute.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposed to insert, beginning on line 21, page 92, the following words:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish plants for the drying or dehydration of vegetables, fruits, and other edible products, in connection with the land-grant colleges in the several States, $250,000: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may establish such plant at some other location in any particular State whenever in his judgment the public interest would be subserved thereby: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, establish such plant in any particular State in cooperation with States, counties, municipalities, individuals, or associations not organized for profit, in which case the Secretary of Agriculture shall not pay more than one-half of the cost of establishing such plant.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] proposes, in lieu of those words, the following:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and operate plants for the drying or dehydration of vegetables, fruits, and other edible products, including the erection or rent of necessary buildings and cooperation with plants maintained and operated for the manufacture of such products, to purchase raw material, to standardize, sell, or otherwise dispose of dried products, and for all necessary expenses, including salaries in Washington and elsewhere, $250,000, which sum shall be immediately available upon the passage of this act, and this fund may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1919.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered as an amendment to this proposed amendment, and it was pending at the time the amendment was considered on yesterday, the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, upon request of the President, to use all or any part of this appropriation for the establishment of such plant or plants at any place in the United States for the purpose of supplying food for the Army and Navy.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill whether this appropriation is needed. I understand that the business of dehydrating vegetables is an active one and is pursued by private enterprise. It is not an experimental affair, but it is demonstrably a success. The business is pretty firmly established in a number of places in the United States; and, unless my information is incorrect, I am unable to perceive the necessity for this appropriation, unless it be that the Government proposes to take over that business or engage in it in competition with citizens.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that the business is being engaged in to some extent. Since the falling off in the drying of hops the establishments on the Pacific slope have been turned largely to the dehydration of fruits and vegetables. It is an industry, however, that is in its incipiency. The committee was of the impression that, in view of the present threatened food shortage, nothing could be done which would accomplish so much in proportion to the money expended as the stimulation of this business, which is comparatively new in the United States.

I may say that in Germany there are between 1,000 and 2,000 of these dehydration plants. They dehydrate some 800,000,000 bushels of potatoes annually. They dehydrate twice as many potatoes as we produce in the United States. This largely accounts for the great resisting power of the German Empire—the dehydration of vegetables and the preservation of practically everything. Under this system there is substantially no waste.

There is one concern in Canada which is turning out 40,000,000 pounds annually, under the supervision of the British Government, furnishing supplies for the British Army. As I say, the business is carried on upon a very limited scale in this country.

One illustration: One carload of dehydrated tomatoes is equivalent to 30 carloads of canned tomatoes, and quite as nutritious, and almost, if not quite, as palatable.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I am not questioning the value of the process. Indeed, I think it is one of the most useful, and at the present time one of the most needed, methods of economizing and conserving food. My inquiry is devoted rather to the question whether the Government should at the present time be required to go into the business, when, its success having been established, it is the subject of private enterprise all the country over?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, so far as I know this is limited to the Pacific coast and has grown out of the falling off of the hop-drying business. The matter came to my attention originally through a representative of Gov. Stephens, of California, who sent a man here to Washington to impress the importance of this industry upon the attention of those in authority, and the possibilities which this business afforded greatly to enhance our food supplies and to avoid the waste in perishable stuffs, which too often occurs in this country. Now, this process practically abolishes the perishability of foodstuffs. It makes them all nonperishable, or, we might say, it makes the summer perpetual. I am sure that there are not facilities in this country to meet what the Government demands might amount to if the stuff were available.

To illustrate the keeping qualities of dehydrated vegetables and fruits, I may say that one concern that was supplying materials of this sort to the British Government during the Boer War had certain supplies left on hand. They sealed them up, and they were called on during the present war to know if they could furnish supplies of these materials again. They still had on hand the surplus left over from the Boer War. They opened it up and found that it was as good as it was when it was put up. Of course, it is not necessary to say that to the Senator, but the committee thought that the enormous possibilities involved in this project would justify the outlay.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as I stated before, I do not question the value of this process and the necessity of adapting it to the preservation of our foodstuffs at the present time. I question only the expediency or the necessity of experimental governmental plants regarding a subject that has been demonstrably a success. Now, $250,000 certainly will not establish plants of sufficient capacity to increase very materially the food supply, and certainly not for the supply of the needed vegetables to the Army.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that the one concern in Canada that is turning out 40,000,000 pounds annually cost $200,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, 40,000,000 pounds annually is a great deal, relatively, but it is hardly worth considering in connection with the demands now made upon this Nation for foodstuffs. I happen to know, through the agency of one of the attachés of the Food Commission, who is from my State, that the drying apparatus of the various beet-sugar factories of the West is now used to increase this supply. I also know, through him, that a number of plants for this purpose are being erected; and at this time, when the needs for money are so great, I do not think we should devote sums to objects that are not positively and directly and obviously necessary.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate the Senator's point of view, and I will say that the committee acted a good deal on the principle that inspired us when we established munition plants. Under ordinary circumstances, I myself should not favor the Government embarking on this enterprise; certainly not beyond a mere demonstration work.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3714.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the Secretary state the pending amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Before that is done, Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator from Oklahoma?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he expects to call up the Agricultural appropriation bill again before to-morrow?

Mr. GORE. I feel certain that there will be no possibility of bringing up the bill again this afternoon, but the Senator from North Carolina will be better authority than I am on that subject.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator from North Carolina think the pending bill will take all the afternoon?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the bill before the Senate will probably occupy the remainder of the day.

Mr. CURTIS. The reason why I asked the Senator is because a Senator wishes to be here when the vote is taken on the eight-hour proposition, and I wanted to notify him if necessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the first amendment passed over be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over was, in section 7, on page 13, to strike out lines 1 to 8 in the following words:

That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, the corporation may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate and license, or refuse to license, the sale, or offering for sale or for subscription, of securities, as hereinafter provided.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital issues committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board, which may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by such committee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate and license, or refuse to license, the sale, or offering for sale or for subscription, of securities, as hereinafter provided. Such committee shall, however, grant licenses for any such sale, or any such offering for sale or for subscription, which it shall determine to be consistent with the foregoing purposes. The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the compensation of the several members of such committee who are not members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be $7,500 per annum, to be paid by the corporation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment was passed over at the request of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], on page 16, line 2, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$1,000."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am going to suggest the absence of a quorum, because I think some Senators who are interested in the amendments were not aware of the fact that we were going to take up the bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Thomas
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Thompson
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Tillman
Curtis	Kendrick	Reed	Townsend
Dillingham	Kenyon	Saulsbury	Trammell
Fernald	King	Sheppard	Underwood
Fletcher	Lewis	Sherman	Vardaman
France	McCumber	Simmons	Walsh

Gronna	New	Smith, S. C.	Williams
Hale	Norris	Smoot	Wolcott
Hardwick	Nugent	Sterling
Henderson	Overman	Stone
Hollis	Owen	Sutherland

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that there are a number of amendments passed over, which have not received the attention of the Senate, on page 14. They will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 8, strike out the words "the corporation" and insert "such committee."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, lines 12, 13, and 14, strike out the words "the corporation. The corporation shall, however, grant licenses for any such sale or any such offer for sale or for subscription which it shall determine to be consistent with the foregoing purposes" and insert "such committee."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 18, strike out the following words:

Any securities which upon the date of the approval of this act are in the possession or control of, or have been hypothecated by, the corporation, association, or obligor issuing the same, shall not be deemed to have been issued prior to the date of the approval of this act, within the meaning hereof.

And insert:

Issues of shares or securities heretofore made, only a part of which have been sold or disposed of prior to the approval of this act, shall not be affected thereby.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "the corporation" and insert "such committee."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "the corporation" and insert "such committee."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 15, strike out the words "the corporation" and insert "such committee."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, in line 17, strike out the words "the corporation" and insert "such committee."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, in section 8, line 21, strike out the word "order" and the comma and insert "or of any."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 16, at the request of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$1,000," so as to read: "shall upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction be fined not more than $1,000," and so forth.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is it in order now to offer an amendment other than a committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not until we have concluded the committee amendments.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I asked to have this amendment passed over last week in order that I might direct the attention of Senators to what this paragraph seeks to accomplish. The paragraph provides punishment by confinement in State prison and by fine for any person who violates any rule or regulation provided in the bill. There is provided in the bill a committee on capital issues, to be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board. They are to provide rules and regulations under which capital issues may be issued. It seems to me that the Senate ought not to allow a State-prison penalty to be attached to a violation of a rule laid down by a committee of the Federal Reserve Board without considering the subject carefully. That was my only object in bringing the matter up.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I earnestly hope that the amendment will not be agreed to; and after the committee amendment is voted down, I think all this third section should be stricken out by the Senate except that part of it which makes it unlawful to violate any provision of the act.

I very much doubt, Mr. President, whether, if the Senate understands the question, it will vote to make it a penal offense for people to violate the regulations of a board or a committee or a bureau. Those regulations may be constantly shifting and changing. I very much doubt the power of Congress to delegate its legislative authority in any such manner and to provide that citizens of the United States shall be put in the penitentiary or shall be fined or shall be treated as felons because they violate, not the provisions of some statute law enacted by authority of Congress, but because they violate a bureau regulation or a committee rule.

I earnestly hope the Senate will disagree to this particular amendment of the committee.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I assume that when the Senators on the floor acquiesce in these committee amendments for perfecting what the committee reported, that that shall not be understood as precluding a Senator from voting against the whole section. I am myself opposed to the whole of this section.

The capital issues committee in England was a voluntary organization. It functioned perfectly. It had the backing of the boards of trade and of the banks, and when the capital issues committee disapproved an issue as against public policy the banks and the boards of trade everywhere gave their disapproval and the issue could not be floated. The record was made before the Committee on Finance showing that to be a fact.

Here not only is a penalty for disregarding a license imposed in proposing to put a man in the penitentiary, but it even goes further and says that anyone "violating any license, order, or any rule or regulation issued hereunder." We are organizing a corporation by this bill, and the corporation would issue its rules and regulations under the authority of the bill. I think it is very ill-advised, I think it is entirely unnecessary, and I think it ought to go out, because it will not impair the operation of the bill in the slightest degree if it does go out.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I want to detain the Senate but a moment. I suppose, although I am in thorough sympathy with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], that we shall have to agree to the committee amendment, as it merely perfects the proposition and probably renders it less obnoxious than it might otherwise be.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I merely wanted to point that out.

Mr. HARDWICK. But as soon as we get through with the committee amendments it will be in order to strike out the entire section or retain only so much as punishes for a violation of the law itself. If that is so, I want to make such a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 3, after the word "than," strike out "four years" and insert "one year," so as to read: "or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than one year, or both."

Mr. REED. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out the entire clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs leave to state to the Senator from Missouri that until the committee amendments are disposed of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to strike out the entire section is not in order.

Mr. REED. No; the Chair did not catch my amendment. The clause before the Senate is the amendment of the committee to change "four years" to "one year." Is not that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; that is the amendment before the Senate.

Mr. REED. I move to strike out the clause "imprisoned for not more than one year, or both."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I rise to a parliamentary question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that motion is in order now simply because it includes within its scope a portion of a committee amendment, and it also includes that which is not included in the committee amendment but is the text of the original bill, and therefore is contrary to the rule we are following to consider only committee amendments first.

Mr. REED. The construction placed by the Senator from North Dakota would not fit, that the committee amendment is dealing with the terms of imprisonment and all you can do is to lengthen or shorten the term. If I were to move to amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "one year" I would then have a clause which would be expressionless. The gist of the committee amendment is to change the reading of the clause "or if a natural person imprisoned for not more than four years" so as to read "or if a natural person imprisoned for not more than one year." The only way to get rid of the penalty altogether, it seems to me, would be simply to attack the whole clause.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me I am not questioning the merits at all or the method by which the Senator seeks to accomplish what he desires to accomplish. My point is simply that he has and will have an opportunity when we get through with the committee amendments to dispose of the motion which he now makes and he is not deprived of it, but it is simply a question as to what time in the proceedings that kind of a motion would be in order.

Mr. REED. I am of the opinion that the amendment offered by the committee goes to the clause, the very spirit and soul of the clause, and I am trying now to attack the clause. I submit it to the Chair for what ruling the Chair desires to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It seems to the Chair that there is very much merit in the contention of the Senator from Missouri, but the Chair is of the opinion that it carves out of the section a portion of the text which was not involved in the committee amendment and that therefore the amendment now offered by the Senator from Missouri will not be in order until the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. REED. Then it would not be proper, I suppose, until we get through with the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Until we get through with the committee amendments.

Mr. REED. I would then make the parliamentary inquiry, How I am at this time to get a vote that will test the question whether the Senate wants to impose the one-year penalty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator in reply that this is the last amendment and when it is disposed of the Chair will entertain the motion submitted by the Senator from Missouri if he desires to move to strike out any portion of the section.

Mr. REED. Rather than argue it, in view of the fact that we are right up to it, I will let it take that course, although I insist that I am right in my position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Now I move to strike out the clause "or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than one year, or both."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 2, to strike out the following words: "or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than one year, or both."

Mr. OWEN rose.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to interrupt me?

Mr. OWEN. I was going to move to strike out the entire section as a substitute, but I do not want to interrupt the Senator if he wishes to discuss that particular feature of it.

Mr. REED. What I have to say may apply to the whole question, and while I have the floor I will proceed very briefly.

I hope we are not going to get affairs in this country in such a condition that every man who has an ambition to engage in business will have to examine not only the criminal statutes but also the orders of a board sitting in Washington and composed of five men lest he be sent to the penitentiary for violating the latest order of that august body.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WATSON. I was wondering why the Senator did not include, as a part of his amendment to strike out, the other words, over on page 15, "or of any rule or regulation issued and duly published hereunder," because that goes to the merits of the proposition the Senator is discussing and is pertinent.

Mr. REED. I will be frank with the Senator. I just came into the Chamber a moment ago from service on a committee. When I entered, this particular clause being discussed, I at once made a motion attacking the clause, because the clause was then being pressed for a vote. What little I have to say can be said now, and possibly some one who desires later to make a motion of a broader character will do so.

Mr. President, because we are at war and are therefore obliged to imperil the lives of the gallant youth of America upon the battle fields of France, it does not necessarily follow that we should place all other American citizen in jeopardy of the penitentiary if peradventure they venture to transact business of a perfectly honest character.

The bill provides—

> That there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board * * * a capital issue committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board, which may * * * under rules to be prescribed (by itself), with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate and license or refuse to license the sale or offering for sale or offering for sale or subscription of securities. * * * No person, firm, corporation, or association shall sell or offer for sale or for subscription as a method of borrowing for capital purposes any issue or part of any issue of securities hereafter issued the par value of which shall be in excess of $100,000, except in accordance with the rules and regulations of such committee, nor when required by such rules * * * except as permitted by license granted by such committee.

Railway securities are exempted from the bill. The next section (8) provides—

> That whoever shall violate any provision of this act or of any license or of any rule or regulation issued * * * or shall violate, neglect, or refuse to comply with the license or of any rule or regulation issued and published hereunder—shall be fined $5,000, and if a natural person sent to the penitentiary for one year.

That is the most astonishing proposition I have seen written in a bill even at this astonishing session of Congress. Let us for a moment examine its unparalleled character.

It is not proposed to send a man to the penitentiary for violating a statute solemnly drawn and aimed at some act that is malum in se, or which is at least malum prohibitum, but it is proposed to send to the penitentiary any man who shall violate certain regulations that may have been prescribed by five gentlemen to be hereafter selected by the reserve board—and they may select themselves. We propose to give this council of five authority first to destroy the credit of an institution by refusing it a license to do business, and then to send its owner to the penitentiary if in an effort he dares to escape total bankruptcy by selling his perfectly sound securities to some one who may want to buy. It is difficult to discuss a question of that kind in parliamentary language, and as this is a parliamentary body I shall have to proceed under considerable restraint.

Draco's laws provided penalties so severe that it was said they were written in blood. I sometimes think modern legislators are envious of the reputation of the ancient tyrant. But Draco's penalties were reserved for those who violated a law, while this bill sends to prison a citizen not for violating a statute passed by Congress but for refusing to obey the order of five men, not one of whom has been clothed by the people with authority to even cast a vote in a legislative assembly.

The proposition, Mr. President, is absolutely monstrous. I do not believe it would be brought forward in the German Reichstag. Why do we have legislation of that kind tendered to us? Why does any committee bring it into this body?

My attention has been so engrossed with other matters that I have not been able to give this bill the consideration it deserves. With its general purpose and scope I was in hearty sympathy, and had said I would support it; but, Mr. President, not only is section 8 wrong, but the section—section 7—that proposes to vest in any 5 men or in any 50 men on earth the right to say that securities may not be offered upon the market, if they are honest securities, is wrong in principle and will do infinite evil and no good. Like some other restrictive legislation that is being attempted, it will work the opposite of that which is intended. We try to legislate the price of an article down; but we succeed only in putting it up, because the minute we try to legislate the price down everybody knows that the article is scarce and everybody begins immediately to want it.

The main purpose of this bill is to keep the financial market open, so that the Government can float its securities and so that certain essential securities may find a ready market. If I wanted to destroy that helpful market; if I wanted to make it so that the people of the country would immediately begin to have financial shivers, to become fearful and doubtful; if I wanted to create a panic in the money market of the country, I could think of no better way than to propose to send to the penitentiary any man who dared offer to sell a share of stock or a bond.

Such a provision in the bill will do more harm than the creation of the bank can possibly do good. It is, in fact, a certification to the world that the Congress of the United States regards the financial situation as so uncertain, as so shaky, as so panicky, that it must stop the sale of securities. Just as certain as you pass that kind of law you will alarm everybody, because you tell everybody the market is weak; because you tell everybody that the market can not absorb securities; because you tell everybody that we are walking over financial quicksands and are liable to sink at any moment.

That is not the way to keep up the value of securities; that is not the way to keep up the money market. The money market is dependent upon confidence. Destroy confidence, and no matter what conditions you have, you will have hard times if you do not have panics. By the provisions I am discussing we go before the country declaring that the financial market is so bad that it can not absorb securities, even though absolutely sound and well secured. The people will certainly conclude that the financial situation is precarious and likely to go to pieces at any moment, else they will ask, why does Congress find it necessary to send honest men to prison for merely offering to sell honest, well-secured bonds?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. OWEN. May I remind the Senator from Missouri that the resources of the banking system of the United States are now shown to be over $40,000,000,000?

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for that information.

Mr. President, you can legislate to destroy confidence, you can legislate to destroy markets; but you can not by the application of force create confidence; you can not by threatening to send to the penitentiary every man, woman, and child in the United States create one dollar of value or one atom of confidence. It is said there is no new thing under the sun. The weary treadmill of the centuries is just turning over and over again, and the same old experiences return to inspire us or to plague us. These things have been tried.

I wish I had here with me Allison's History of the French Revolution. It tells how the French revolutionists undertook to bolster up the value of their assignats. The purchasing value of that money was going down, so they passed a law prescribing heavy penalties for anyone who refused to accept it at its face value; but, instead of keeping the value of their money up, they drove it down. Then then increased the penalties, and just in proportion as they increased the penalties they drove the value of the money down. Manifestly, when it becomes necessary to send a man to the guillotine in order to make him take money, the money is not worth taking. Even the French peasants in the days of the French Revolution had sense enough to know that.

All that part of this bill that proposes in any way to prohibit the citizen from offering his securities upon the market ought to be stricken out—every word of it.

Let us create this great loan bank; I am in favor of it. It is revolutionary, but these are times when we need to mobilize resources. The creation of that great loan bank will help to do that. Let us create this great reservoir, to which the essential industries of the country may go for support, and let us withhold from the benefits of that reservoir every institution that is not essential to the country in the opinion of the men that will govern this bank, and you will have already given such advantage to the concerns that you deem worthy of help, and you will have already placed at such disadvantage those that are denied the privileges of this great institution, that you will need absolutely no other power whatsoever to maintain the conditions you desire. But do not say to the citizen, "If you offer to sell a bond to a man who wants to buy, you will be sent to the penitentiary." Do not say to the individual or small corporation that is doing a legitimate business, "You shall not get any money in the market, and if you dare try we will send you to the penitentiary."

Mr. OWEN and Mr. HARDWICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma, who, I think, first addressed the Chair.

Mr. OWEN. I merely want to call the attention of the Senator to the very important fact in support of his argument that Mr. Warburg, who it seems conceived this plan, made this statement before the committee:

The British committee simply provided that anybody who wanted to issue securities had to get the O. K. of this committee.

Senator LODGE. Was this a law?

Mr. WARBURG. No; it was voluntary, but it acted at once as a law, and the result was a surprising one. The statistics are here. As a matter of fact they went so far that practically every issue of new securities stopped, municipal issues stopped, even where commitments had been made, and the Government stepped in and indemnified people where it was necessary in order to stop building operations already contracted for.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I simply pause at this moment long enough to call attention to the last sentence the Senator read, to the effect that the Government stepped in and indemnified those who had sustained losses.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. It says where contracts had already been made.

Mr. REED. Yes; where contracts had already been made—showing the tremendous power that is vested in the board when we give it the machinery this bill creates, and showing also that that power may be very destructive and may injure those whom the Government has no desire to injure; and hence, in the case referred to by the Senator, indemnification had to be made.

I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I merely want to suggest to the Senator that he stated a moment ago, as I remember, substantially this, that, although this bill did not provide any penal punishment for individuals, if corporations offered their stocks for sale, yet they are liable to financial penalty. Is that the substance of the Senator's statement?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, as a matter of fact, a penal clause is provided against individuals if they offer stock for sale, because the provision is that—any officer, director, or agent of the corporation or association, or member of any firm, who shall knowingly participate in any such violation, neglect, or refusal shall be punished by a like fine or imprisonment, or both.

So that if the officer or agent or director of a corporation offers to sell any stock contrary to the provisions of this bill he would actually go to the penitentiary.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know the Senator is in thorough sympathy with what some of us are trying to do, and if the Senator would change his motion so as to strike out, on page 14, in line 13, all after the word "act," down to and including the word "shall," in line 17, then the effect of that would be not to make it a crime to do anything except to violate the law itself, which would be some improvement. Then we could take a test vote, I think, on the proposition as to whether we propose to make it a penal offense to violate the regulations. Such an amendment would leave violations of the law still penalized, but would eliminate from the bill the proposal to make violations of regulations, and so forth, punishable. I think that would be what the Senator is striking at and what a number of us would like to vote for.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, let me say this in conclusion: Appealing to Senators here for their candid judgment, I insist—and I hope the chairman of the committee can concur in this—that there is no necessity in the world for any penalty. Let us see what situation will exist if this bill is passed, what powers the Government will possess, and what the condition of the financial market will be? First, we have the Federal Reserve System, which is completely controlled by a board appointed by the President, and it may now as well be taken as a fact as much so as if it had already happened, that the Federal Reserve Board will see to it that the moneys of the Federal reserve banks will never be used to help out financially the sale of stocks or bonds of any corporations which are under the ban of this commission of five men.

It is proposed now to create a bank with $4,000,000,000 potential assets. That bank will deny credit to any institution unless the institution shall have been approved by the capital issues committee. When the capital issues committee shall have refused to list as entitled to credit any institution, the effect will be almost as disastrous as it would be, yes, it will be more disastrous than it is to-day for an institution to have its stocks and its bonds stricken off a stock exchange as unworthy of consideration.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to suggest to the Senator that, under the practice already agreed upon with regard to the voluntary capital issues committee of the Treasury, a stock exchange will not list any stock that receives their disapproval.

Mr. REED. How can a company sell its stock if it has been refused the right of being listed by the capital issues committee, if, in addition to that, it has been refused the right to be listed on the stock exchanges; if, in addition to that, it is barred from the benefits of the Federal Reserve System; and if, in addition to all that, it can not under any circumstances have its stocks or bonds received as worthy of a loan by this great bank that is to absorb so much of the credits of the United States and is to become so potential a thing?

Mr. President, under those circumstances no criminal penalty is necessary. I am going to change the motion——

Mr. OWEN. Will not the Senator accept the substitute which I offered and make that his motion—to strike out section 8?

Mr. REED. That is just the motion I am going to make.

Mr. OWEN. Then I withdraw my substitute, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Well, I will accept the substitute, if that is more agreeable. In lieu of the motion I made I am going to move to strike out all of section 8.

Mr. WATSON. What is the amendment, may I ask?

Mr. REED. To strike out all of section 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Calder	Kenyon	Poindexter	Swanson
Culberson	King	Pomerene	Thomas
Curtis	Kirby	Reed	Thompson
Fernald	Lodge	Saulsbury	Trammell
Fletcher	McCumber	Sheppard	Underwood
France	McKellar	Sherman	Vardaman
Gerry	Martin	Simmons	Wadsworth
Gronna	Myers	Smith, Ariz.	Walsh
Harding	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Hardwick	New	Smith, Md.	Watson
Henderson	Norris	Smith, Mich.	Williams
Hollis	Nugent	Smoot	Wolcott
Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sterling
Jones, Wash.	Owen	Stone
Kendrick	Page	Sutherland

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to announce that my colleague, the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the motion before the Senate is to strike out section 8, which imposes a very serious penalty upon anyone who disregards any license, order, or any rule or regulation of the committee on the issue of securities.

In Great Britain and France they did not find any necessity for imposing a penalty. The testimony of Mr. Warburg before the committee was to this effect:

> The British committee simply provided that anybody who wanted to issue securities had to get the O. K. of this committee.
> Mr. WARBURG. No; it was voluntary, but it acted at once as a law, and the result was a surprising one. The statistics are here. As a matter of fact, they went so far that practically every issue of new securities stopped, municipal issues stopped, even where commitments had been made, and the Government stepped in and indemnified people where it was necessary in order to stop building operations already contracted for.

He then gives the figures of what occurred in Great Britain.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me to call attention to what Mr. Warburg said before the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He says:

> In England they have an act which they call the D. O. R. A.—the defense of the realm act—which is a very broad act, and which they can readily put behind anything they want to enforce. Such an act we have not got; but I believe that without such an act, probably with the spirit in which the work of the committee has been accepted—

That is, the voluntary committee—

> we probably would have very good results.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, this committee, when it refuses its approval, has behind it the New York Stock Exchange and all other exchanges, which will refuse to list the security; it has behind it the exchanges of the whole country; it has behind it the banks of the country; and it has behind it the moral influence and patriotism of the country. It is not necessary to threaten American citizens with the penitentiary on a matter of this sort, and I do not believe we ought to do it. I think it is an unnecessary offense on our part to the citizens of the United States, who deserve our trust and our deepest respect.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. How does the Senator know that these rules or requirements would have behind them the New York Stock Exchange?

Mr. OWEN. Because Mr. Warburg says the exchange will refuse to list unapproved securities.

Mr. STONE. Oh, Mr. Warburg says so?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; he says so, and it is not necessary for anybody to say so. It is perfectly obvious that with the enormous power of the United States conducting the financial affairs of this country under such conditions the stock exchanges will cooperate and are obliged to do so. They could not do otherwise, and they have already agreed to cooperate.

Mr. STONE. Then, Mr. President, if all that be true, and if this legislation is deemed necessary to the proper prosecution of the war and the maintenance of public credit, if, despite the New York Stock Exchange, the securities were offered without a license, or in violation of the license, why should there not be a punishment for it?

Mr. OWEN. Because it is unnecessary to threaten people who are not going to violate this rule, except possibly in the most obscure and negligible and accidental manner.

Mr. STONE. If people will not violate the law or the rules, then I submit that they are not threatened; but, for example, if a man is not going to commit burglary or murder or other crime, he is not threatened by the passage of a law punishing such crimes when committed.

Mr. OWEN. I do not think I can debate the matter with a Senator who regards the possibility of some man asking for credit contrary to a rule of the Treasury as being coincident with murder and rape. I have no further comment on it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, that remark, I think, was hasty and hardly kind, for I was using the examples I mentioned as mere illustrations. I was seeking to show that if we passed a law against any crime, whether felony or misdemeanor, if any people affected by the law were not likely to render themselves amenable to its penalties, why, all right; but laws of that nature, penal statutes, are passed to reach those who do violate the law, and I see no particular reason why my friend from Oklahoma should be aroused to any feeling because I happened to mention particular crimes that usually come to the thoughts of men when they are making illustrations pertinent to a subject of this kind.

Mr. President, I think if we are going to enact a law of this kind, we should provide a definite means for enforcing it. If we are going to enact it, we ought not to write it and leave it as a mere blank on the statute books.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to ask the Senator this question: Even if he thinks that about the provisions of a statute, does the Senator believe that we ought to make it a penal offense to violate the rules and regulations of any board or bureau or committee?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, as to that, when you pass a law fixing a general policy of the Government, and authorize and empower a department of the Government to arrange, prepare, and promulgate rules and regulations for the enforcement of the general policy of the Government as expressed in the law, I think there is no reason why it should not be prescribed in the statute that the penalties should apply to the rules and regulations thus prescribed; and, Mr. President, that has been done over and again.

Mr. HARDWICK. And the courts have held that it was illegal in case after case.

Mr. STONE. I do not agree to the Senator's statement as made.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me state to the Senator further, if he will yield further, that there is this good reason why it should not be done—because those regulations may be very easily and very swiftly changed, and very frequently changed, and they may be changed almost without the knowledge of the people affected by them.

Mr. STONE. Of course, there is always a possibility of abuse, but we can hardly proceed upon the theory that abuses will be indulged in intentionally or for the mere sake of abuse. Abuses will be exceptional, if they occur at all; and I assert that in the course of our governmental administration where any such abuses have occurred they have been exceptional, and against such abuses the courts are a shield.

Mr. President, I do not think we ought to incorporate a provision in this bill calculated to weaken it. If we are against this bill, if we want to cripple it by all sorts of amendments, very well; but if we are for the bill, and want to make it effective and worth while, then this section ought not to be struck out, because it would leave the licensing provision of the bill as a practical nullity. And, according to the Senator, upon whom are we to depend if we strike this provision out? Not upon the law of the land; not upon established authority, certainly. We must depend, as the Senator says, upon the Stock Exchange of New York and other like concerns, who will get behind the Government, and see to it that offerings of securities will be regulated by them. It is said that security offerings will not receive recognition by the brokers, much less by the New York Stock Exchange itself, unless indorsed in some visionary way by this proposed voluntary committee. Mr. President are we to turn in the enforcement of our public policy from the organized agencies of the Government to the New York Stock Exchange? To me that is a new doctrine.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. STONE. Surely.

Mr. OWEN. The patriotism of the people of this country is sufficient, as the patriotism of the people of Great Britain was found sufficient, to make effective the rules of the British committee, and the same thing was true of the French committee. It is true that the New York Stock Exchange is the great market where these securities would be handled, and the patriotism of the New York Stock Exchange has already expressed itself by agreeing not to list securities of this kind. I hardly think the Senator is justified in making the argument that the New York Stock Exchange is being substituted for a governmental power.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if Senators approve the licensing program outlined in the bill, if they think it is a wise thing to do—and if they do not think it is they ought not to put it into the statutes—but if they think it is right, and if we mean to pass it, then we ought to make it effective; otherwise it would be a farce.

Mr. President, I want to ask a question in regard to the New York Stock Exchange, which within the hour has been thrust upon our confidence as one of the great patriotic and delightfully unselfish institutions of the country—one of those institutions which during its eventful life has sought only and solely to contribute to the welfare of the Nation and the people.

This appeal has struck my heart at an angle that I can not exactly calculate; but if the view which confuses me is understood and prevails in the Senate, I want to ask, even aside from the tremendous power of the New York Stock Exchange, which seemingly Senators would substitute for governmental authority and depend upon, what harm is going to result even in that strange view—what reason can be given against the insertion in the statute itself of a provision for its effective enforcement? If you do not favor the provision in question, you ought not to put it in; but if you do favor it, then, in the name of common sense, what objection can there be to putting a provision in the law that would make it enforcible, despite even the autocratic will of the New York Stock Exchange? I lift my hat now for the first time and bow my head humbly before the stock exchange as a great moral and financial agency in the United States throughout a long and eventful history, made even in my generation. For the first time I take my hat off and bow before it; but despite this tremendous agency, thus charmingly presented to us as the force that is to command public attention, arouse public enthusiasm and patriotism, and all that sort of thing, and therefore compel obedience to the general national policy, I still insist upon what I think even the New York Stock Exchange should not seriously object to, since no great harm could come of it even in the hands of the exchange, namely, the vesting somewhere of a power to enforce the law.

Mr. President, I beg to say, with all due apologies to the New York Stock Exchange, that the exchange is not a court. Up to date it has no power to administer punishment officially. It may do it in some indirect way financially; I do not know about that; but it can not arrest or arraign a man, or bring him before it as a tribunal to be tried and sentenced to pay a fine or go to prison. I speak now of the present; not the future. We have not yet clothed the New York Stock Exchange with judicial authority. That may be one of the surprises of the future.

Mr. President, is it not plain common sense to put into this bill a provision that would make it forceful and effective, a provision that would subject men violating the law to penalties commensurate with the offense?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the New York Stock Exchange has very little to do with this case. In speaking against this provision I called attention to the fact that a criminal penalty is unnecessary, because, when the capital-issues committee shall have refused to list the securities of any company, that in itself will practically drive those securities off the market. I called attention to the fact that the Federal reserve banks would not receive any such securities, and that in itself would make it impossible for them to be marketed in any great number; and that the great bank we are creating would not receive these securities, and that would make it impossible for them to be received by any of the banks of the country; and, therefore, that it was not necessary to impose a prison penalty in order to bolster up the orders of the capital-issues committee. It was at about that time that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] rose and said that my statement was so much the case that securities refused recognition by the present unauthorized committee had already been stricken from its lists by the New York Stock Exchange; and thus the New York Stock Exchange got into this case, and in that slight degree alone. So I hope nobody here will decide this question, and that my distinguished colleague will not decide it, upon the basis of any feeling against the New York Stock Exchange.

I desire now to answer, if I can, the argument that has been put forward; but, first, let me ask, What is in this bill? What is the proposition that is now before the Senate? The bald proposition before the Senate is to put into the hands of five men, called the capital-issues committee, the power, first, to destroy any private enterprise in the United States that has to borrow a single cent of money, that has a single security it may want to offer. It may be a private corporation with not more than three or four stockholders that has been borrowing money from its local bank upon its bonds, and that desires to renew its bonds; it may be a family affair. And yet, if the capital-issues committee—five men sitting here in Washington—see fit, they can deny the right of those men who own that little institution to go into the market, or to go to their neighbor, or to go to their bank, and get a dollar of money. Such a power as that never was lodged in any five men in any free country of this earth.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I merely want to say that that is notwithstanding the fact that a board properly created under the laws of a State—and most States have them—has approved of the issuance of the very security which the Senator says can not be used for the purpose of borrowing money.

Mr. REED. What is the next proposition contained in this bill? It is that these five men, at least three of whom are to be members of the Federal Reserve Board—we do not know which three—are to have the right to make rules and regulations; and it is proposed that any citizen of the United States who shall violate any such rule shall be sent to the penitentiary for four years.

Mr. STONE. It has been reduced from four years to one year.

Mr. REED. Yes; it has been reduced to one year. But has it ever been laid down in a free country that five men not occupying a legislative position, not occupying a position recognized by the Constitution of the country as in any wise lawgivers, and make rules or laws for the violation of which a citizen can be sent to the penitentiary for any period of time, whether for one year or one day or one second? What kind of a madness is——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. In a moment. What kind of a madness is it that proposes to take a citizen who is handling his own property and is doing nothing that is wrong in itself, who is cheating nobody, and to send him to the penitentiary because he offers the bonds of his company fairly and openly on the market or sells them to a private individual? I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I did not rise to take issue with the statement the Senator has just made. It was the preceding one to which I desire to direct his attention. I take it, the Senator was advancing the idea that the board was not authorized to establish rules the violation of which would be criminal?

Mr. REED. I am well aware of the fact that there have been some decisions of courts holding that under certain circumstances certain boards or tribunals may be authorized to make regulations the violation of which may be punished by imprisonment. But I do not think they apply to a case like this.

Mr. WALSH. I merely rose to state to the Senator that it has been held that the violation of a rule and regulation established by the Secretary of Agriculture under authority of law could be proceeded against.

Mr. REED. Having to do, however, with a thing which is essentially injurious to the public health or to the public morals or to the public property. This is not of that kind at all; and even those cases were long debated, and, in my opinion, of doubtful authority.

Mr. President, I do not like to differ from my colleague. It is the first time in my life I have ever differed from him in public.

Mr. STONE. I wish to say that I was not aware when I made my statement that I was differing from my colleague. I thought I was with very great reluctance differing from my friend from Oklahoma.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in my opinion all of section 7 ought to go out and all of section 8 ought to go out. Let me as briefly as I possibly can offer the reasons. I have already stated them once, but there are Senators in the Chamber who were not here at that time. This bill has two parts. One is the creation of a great financial institution, the greatest in the world; it is to have authorized assets of four thousand million dollars—that is its bond-issuing power. Its securities may become the basis, after passing through banks, of the issuance of money of the Government through the Federal reserve banks. It is intended to be powerful enough to completely dominate the financial market.

Mr. President, I believe thus far the bill is a splendid conception. It is radical, it is revolutionary, but we must meet extraordinary conditions by extraordinary remedies. But it is wholesome. It destroys nobody's business. It destroys no vested interest. It is intended, on the other hand, to sustain the credit of the Nation by sustaining the general financial structure of the country. It is in my opinion so powerful a thing that it would be very dangerous if it was in the hands of men who would not administer it wisely. It is so powerful a thing that any security upon which it places its mark of disapproval will have no market value in the United States except it be a local market where the institution is known to men who are in the immediate neighborhood. It is so tremendous a force that under other circumstances than those confronting us I would not be in favor of its creation at all.

Now, this institution, in addition, has this great buttressing power. The men who manage it will be so intimately connected with the Federal reserve banks that the two systems will each work in harmony, and if they do work in harmony I want to ask what institution in the United States can borrow very much money or can get very far with the fact known that its securities will not be received in either of these banks; for that, of course, means that the securities will be at least at a great discount in every bank of the United States.

Mr. President, under those circumstances we need no penalty. Under those circumstances it is not necessary to lodge in three or four men the power of life or death over the enterprises of citizens. Already the power that will be concentrated in the Federal Treasury and in these boards, that are merely auxiliaries of it, will be of such vast proportions that the whole financial situation will be dominated.

Now, let us not debase a good measure by putting in these extreme penalties. While we live under the flag that typifies individual liberty and the rule of law and the rights of property, let us not put in the hands of any five men on earth the power to make rules and regulations that will send a citizen to the penitentiary because he may have tried to sell the securities of a company in which his fortune, great or small, may be invested.

I hope the amendment I have offered will be accepted.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the Senator from Missouri takes his seat, as I have been necessarily absent from the Chamber a little while, may I ask the Senator from Missouri if he moves to strike out section 8 in its entirety?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Missouri has moved to strike out section 8 of the bill in its entirety. The argument of the Senator from Missouri was directed primarily against section 7 of the bill. Logically it seems to me that his amendment should have been first directed to section 7 rather than section 8 of the bill. If section 7 is stricken out, I know of no necessity whatever for the punitive provision in section 8. Section 7 is the only section of the bill, as I now remember, which positively prohibits anything.

Now, I want to call the Senator's attention to one provision in section 7. He does not pretend in his motion to strike out section 7. Section 7 provides that—

> No person, firm, corporation, or association shall sell, or offer for sale or for subscription, any issue, or any part of any issue, of securities hereafter issued, the par or face value of which issue shall be in excess of $100,000.

Anything less than $100,000 is not prohibited. Section 7 provides for a license. There were those members of the committee who did not deem it expedient to have section 7 in the law at all. The majority of the committee preferred to maintain that section in the bill. It is in the bill at the present time. There is no proposition at present to strike it out of the bill. That provision prohibits any person, not a stock exchange, not the New York exchange or Chicago exchange, or any other exchange, but any person or any bank or any association from selling these securities where the issue is over $100,000. There is a positive provision.

Now, suppose that some individual or association outside entirely of your exchanges does in defiance of this positive law attempt and succeed in selling these securities. What are we going to do about it? It is quite a simple proposition. Are we going to say in the bill we prohibit you from doing anything of the kind and have no provision in the bill that will make our provision of any value to us? How are we going to stop it? Is it not almost ridiculous to make a proposition in a bill which prohibits the doing of a thing, and at the same time make no provision whatever for the enforcement of our prohibition?

If the Senator would move to strike out section 7, of course that is entirely a different proposition. His amendment, I say, is certainly far broader than his argument, because section 8 provides:

> That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act—

Not merely to violate the provisions of a regulation. There might be considerable said about a prohibition against violating a mere regulation which would carry with it a punishment for its violation after it has been published, but here Congress enacts a positive law, and it provides a punishment for disobedience of that law, not which the Secretary of the Treasury or the board has made but one which Congress has made. It does seem to me in all good faith that we should have some punitive legislation upon that particular point.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question. With the exception of section 7, which prohibits certain things and which, I frankly say, ought to go out, and have said it ought to go out if the penalty clause goes out, at least I want to see it go out—with the exception of section 7 what is there in the bill of a prohibitive nature at all?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what I have stated. I stated in the very beginning that the Senator's position would be absolutely logical if we strike out section 7.

Mr. REED. But the Senator in his argument goes further than that. The Senator has stated that my motion to strike out section 8 does not include the language "whoever shall violate any of the provisions of this act." But if we strike out section 7 then there is nothing left in the bill except the construction of this banking system and the regulations concerning it.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true; but suppose we adopt the Senator's motion to strike out section 8 and then a further motion to strike out section 7 should not prevail, you have section 7 still in the bill without section 8 imposing a penalty for a violation of it.

Mr. REED. That is true. We might proceed the other way; but if we strike out this penalty at least it can be said that the other clause left in the bill will not be one that can be enforced by sending human beings to the penitentiary.

Mr. McCUMBER. My argument is, and the Senator finally agrees with me, that certainly if we strike out section 8 we ought to strike out section 7.

Mr. REED. I do agree with the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I go further and say if we strike out section 7 then there would be time enough to determine whether we should strike out section 8, but unless we strike out section 7 we ought not to strike out that portion of section 8 which relates to a positive act.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. The logical force of what the Senator says I think can hardly be disputed. However, I want to call his attention to the facts as they now exist. There is already established a voluntary capital issues committee in the Federal Reserve Board. They are exercising that power now and it is working very well. It is not absolutely necessary to have sections 7 or 8, although it would give somewhat greater dignity to the organization. If the British committee and the French committee worked perfectly well without a penalty, I think we might with perfect propriety strike out the prohibition that no person shall do so, leaving it to the patriotism of this country and to the powerful influences that would control such issues. I think it would function just as well in the United States as it would in Great Britain or France, because I think our people are just as patriotic as those are there. After all, we have got to go back down to the grass roots appealing to the people of this country and to their patriotism to stand by the Government and support these bond issues, to raise money by war savings stamps, to provide the funds for the Red Cross. In my own State they had a house-to-house canvass for the Red Cross in every county. To assume that we can not rely upon the patriotism of the country, but we must threaten them with the penitentiary upon a matter of this character I thought was a bad policy, and I agreed with the junior Senator from Missouri that it would have the effect of disturbing the confidence of the people in the sobriety and dignity of the Government itself.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are other Senators, and some on the committee, who agreed with the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Missouri that section 7 ought to have been stricken out entirely, that there is no occasion for it.

Mr. OWEN. I do not agree that section 7 should be stricken out.

Mr. McCUMBER. They believed that this voluntary association would have accomplished exactly as much, and that there was no necessity for those sections. Section 7 is the section which refers to the licensing. I am not attempting to make any issue on that particular argument at this time. While I think it is well to retain section 7, I admit that there can be much said against it. But the point now is, in my opinion, that we ought at this time to defeat a motion brought as it is to strike out all of section 8 as long as section 7 remains in the bill.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Even though section 7 be not stricken from the bill, would the Senator have any objection to striking out on page 15, section 8, the words "or any rule or regulation issued and duly published hereunder"?

Mr. McCUMBER. I should not have any serious objection, although I say to the Senator candidly in a number of bills we have already passed conferring these exclusive powers upon the department we have included those words. So we have a precedent for it. I think it is not only in the food bill but in a number of other bills that have been passed during the present session.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator does not regard those as precedents that are wise or safe?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not say that. I think when we provide a punishment for an offense we ought to know beforehand what the offense is and what offense ought to be fixed by the law itself.

Mr. HARDWICK. And not depend on shifting and changing regulations.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree with that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then, that part of the bill certainly ought to go out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, I wish to answer the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma that we do not need this extra power——

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator please, I am in favor of section 7 in so far as it establishes this issues committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I have reference to the issuing of licenses to sell securities of a greater amount than $100,000.

Mr. OWEN. I think it is better to have that committee established by statute rather than by a mere regulation. Although the regulation would do very well, I think it better to have it established by statute.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator does not believe that we should impose any penalty for the refusal of any person to comply with the license provision.

Mr. OWEN. No; I think we can rely on the patriotism of the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to read just one brief excerpt from the testimony of Mr. Warburg when this same question came up. Mr. O'SHAUNESSY was examining him in the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. On what page?

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 35:

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would like to ask Mr. Warburg about the committee, of which he is a member, dealing with these securities. Do you think they will go on and perform their duties effectually without any law being passed to define their duties and responsibilities?

Mr. WARBURG. You mean in case you do not give the power to enforce orders?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Yes; I mean will they go along in a voluntary way just as this English committee did? Will they go along with the same duties and power as if they were created by law?

Mr. WARBURG. In England they have an act which we call D. O. R. A., the defense of the realm act, which is a very broad act, and which they can really put behind anything they want to enforce. Such an act we have not got. But I believe that without such an act probably, with the spirit in which the work of the committee has been accepted, we probably will have good results.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. And it will be just as effective?

Mr. WARBURG. It is very important, however, that there should be some big stick in the background. I mean that we should have power, if necessary, in case we can not get the cooperation, particularly of some less patriotic operators. For instance, there are still a great many oil propositions of a very doubtful kind which absorb a great deal of money, and some people offering them do not care what we say—

Evidently he had had some experience in it already—

It is very important, therefore, to have a big stick in the background which would indicate that if we can not get voluntary cooperation we can get it by act of law. I think that would be useful.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator able to say that that portion of Mr. Warburg's testimony which refers to prospective oil investments would indicate that Mr. Warburg feels that anybody can go into the production of oil without taking chances?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not suppose he thought anything of the kind. On the contrary, I have an idea that he thought the public would take a bigger chance and spend their money more freely with a certainty that gasoline and oil are bound to go up than in possibly any other field, and they would be taken in more easily along that line, and without some such power would not be able to control the amount of money that would be used for that purpose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator will pardon me for a remark or two before I ask him a question, this brings up an exceedingly interesting phase of the whole situation. That sentence of Mr. Warburg is to my mind the most significant contribution to this discussion. It would imply that he believes that anything like a prospective venture toward the development of oil wells is something that should be discouraged. That is what it means, because it is something that is an effort or an undertaking involving a good deal of risk. Everyone knows, of course, that that is a fact in the oil business as well as in mining. Now, are we to understand from Mr. Warburg's position before the committee that the development of the oil fields of the country is to cease until the war is over, because it might take a little too much capital and some capital be wasted? Perhaps it is unfair to put such a question to the Senator from North Dakota——

Mr. McCUMBER. Not at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But I could not help, on that phase of the matter, as he read Mr. Warburg's testimony, to direct the attention of the Senator to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not unfair to me although I think it is a little unfair to Mr. Warburg to draw any such conclusion from his testimony. All that he is seeking in this law is to require these companies to take out a license. There is no prohibition in the law on their selling securities, but this board may pass upon those the same as it would upon any other character of stock. Gold may be just as essential as oil, silver may be just as essential as oil, but whether the American people shall expend hundreds of millions or almost billions in gold-mining stock and silver-mining stock might well be a subject, at least during this war, that might be to a certain extent checked.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has said there is no prohibition in the bill against that. I call the attention of the Senator that this whole discussion is about a prohibition penalty.

Mr. McCUMBER. The prohibition in section 7 is against selling without first obtaining license. The license can not be obtained until the whole subject is presented to this board.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly so.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is true that the board must pass judgment upon whether that investment is of a nature that would be helpful in the war or whether it would be against the interests of the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall have some observations to make upon that point.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course there is no occasion for it unless it is to cover cases of this character.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in just a second. But, Mr. President, my main point is that we ought not to accept this amendment until the question whether or not we shall retain section 7 has been determined by the Senate. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator leaves that part of the discussion, I wish to ask him if he does not think that the moral pressure that is to be exerted by the Federal Reserve Board would accomplish all the practical results? I do this in view of the fact that I have on my files a number of advertisements in the absence of any law of companies carrying on business with a certificate that these issues are not incompatible with the public interest, that certificate being signed by Mr. Warburg.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it would accomplish very much indeed, but I think it would accomplish more if there was a positive law back of the efforts of the board.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, as it is now, with Mr. Warburg on the committee, it is now a voluntary committee on the part of the Federal Reserve Board, and by refusing the certificate it announces to the investing world that their ban is upon it; and it, in effect, serves all useful purposes in conserving capital and preventing unwise investment, because that is notice to the public generally that the application has been made and denied. As it is now, the issues that carry this certificate find it advantageous to promote the sale of the bond issue by attaching the certificate to the prospectus. All of the bond houses that I have had occasion to examine that have that certificate now attach it to the prospectus sent out. I have a number of them which have come to my office, and have cut some from the advertisements in the metropolitan newspapers carrying that certificate, notifying the public that this issue has received the approval of and evidently would be a security on which the Federal reserve bank and the member banks would look with favor as a proper investment. That moral pressure exerted upon the investing public, I have found, is the most valuable of all the means that can be employed, even more so than penal sections.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the position taken by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is an inconsistent one, if I understood his statement in relation to these two sections of the bill. I think if we strike out section 8—the penalty section of the bill—there will be no need of retaining section 7, for with no penalty provided for we might as well have, and I much prefer, a voluntary system. The result will be the same, as far as restrictions of issues are concerned, in the one case as in the other.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Utah constantly ignores the experience of France and of Great Britain.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will come to that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. Those countries did not have to threaten anybody with the penitentiary. This has worked well there and has worked perfectly well up to this time in the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma is right as to that, and I agree with him. I am going to call attention to how it has worked in England.

I say the Senator is inconsistent, because if section 8 goes out of the bill section 7 ought also to be eliminated, and then we would have a voluntary system. I know of no board that could be appointed which would be better able to pass upon licenses than the board that is now established in the Treasury Department.

Mr. OWEN. I think it is true that that board is a splendid board and has been splendidly selected; and this bill proposes to give them salaries and to give them a legal status.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that the board that is now appointed is doing the work successfully. Should it be necessary for them to have additional assistance, it can be furnished in the shape of clerks or attorneys or experts as needed. I suppose they will require some additional help; I am quite sure of that; but it seems to me, if we are going to have a voluntary system, the board that is now in existence in the Treasury Department is as good as could be selected.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me just what the power of that board is? I will ask, does it materially matter, if we are going to create an official board by law, with power to do things and to enforce its judgment, whether it is this particular board or another?

Mr. SMOOT. The present board has a moral suasion——

Mr. STONE. That is all.

Mr. SMOOT. That, to my mind, will be just as potent in preventing the issue of improper securities in the future as it would be if they were clothed with all the power in the world, and I want to take time now to show why that is so.

I refer, Mr. President, here to what has happened in England under a voluntary system. Take the year 1916 and the first six months, to June, 1917, and let us see what issues have been entirely eliminated under this voluntary system. Not a pound has been loaned to the colonial corporations in England.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Utah if what he means to say is that he is opposed to section 7 and desires that it shall be stricken from the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I was opposed to it in committee, and I myself believed that it would be better to have a voluntary system than to have such a one as provided for in section 7. Let us consider the restrictions of loans in England by her voluntary system. We find that for the last two years not a pound has been loaned to the Indian and colonial rails; not a pound to the foreign government loans; not a pound for foreign corporations; not a pound for foreign railroads; not a pound for American railways; not a pound for British municipal loans; not a pound for British railways; not a pound for the gas and water corporations of England; not a pound for the mining companies of England; not a pound for exploration and financial operations; not a pound to the breweries and distilleries; not a pound to merchants—that is, during the year 1917, though there was during the year 1916—not a pound to stores and trading; nothing whatever to estates and lands.

I might go on down the list. It will be found that the only loans that were actually indorsed under this voluntary system in England and the bulk of the loans which were made were British Government loans.

We are not as yet in as critical a financial condition as England, and I have no reason to think that any system adopted by the committee appointed would be so strict as they have been compelled to be in the last year and a half in England.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. In Great Britain what is known as the defense of the realm act confers upon the Government ample power to create a board of the character which was created, and which exercised the functions which led to the result that the Senator from Utah has indicated in the memorandum which he has read to the Senate. In view of the fact that this act of the English Parliament vested in the Government the power to create such a board as this, with the functions it exercised, does not the Senator think that that board is more than a voluntary institution?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I do not think it is more than a voluntary institution. It is created not by act of Parliament, but under the power delegated to the board; and the board in turn appoint the license committee, just the same as certain powers have been delegated to the Secretary of the Treasury and he in turn has appointed the voluntary committee that is acting to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. But when the law vests in the Government power to create a board, and the Government creates that board, is it not to be assumed that it was created in accordance with and in pursuance of that power?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must know from what I said in the beginning that if that board were created by an act of Parliament, without any penalty attached, it would be virtually a voluntary committee just the same as this will be a voluntary committee if section 8 is eliminated from the bill and section 7 remains.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I think that we are confusing the situation really by referring, as we all have been doing, to a voluntary committee. That committee, of course, is appointed by the Government as is this committee here, which the Secretary of the Treasury has selected. The voluntary element is in the compliance of the public or of persons desiring to raise new capital with the orders of that committee. It is the voluntary compliance of the people affected by the action of the committee; but the committee itself is, of course, not voluntary.

Mr. SMOOT. I took it for granted that we all understood that.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah and I are members of the Finance Committee. I looked with a good deal of doubt and hesitancy upon section 7, but I did not look with any doubt upon section 8, if section 7 was to go in, except possibly as to the details of it—whether the penalty should be $5,000 fine and five years' imprisonment, or something less.

Mr. President, I thought that all of us in the committee room, after we had gone over these sections 7 and 8, notwithstanding our several doubts and objections to these sections, had agreed to them. I am prepared now to support section 7; but I am left wondering. Does the Senator from Utah, or does any member of the Finance Committee come now to oppose section 7? Are we going to ask that it be rejected; that it be eliminated from the bill? If so, then I am up against that proposition so far as the committee is concerned, and I should like to know just where I stand with reference to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as the Senator from Missouri will remember, there were a good many Senators on the committee who voted against section 7 of the bill.

Mr. STONE. But there was no minority report. We agreed and authorized the chairman to report the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I know there was no minority report, but I gave notice at the time that I reserved the right to vote against section 7 of the bill in the Senate. I suppose the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Massachusetts remember my doing so. I want to be perfectly frank about the matter. I say that I did not intend to say one word in opposition to this section and had intended to let the Senate vote; but, in view of the statement which was made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], I felt that it ought at least to receive some explanation. It was for that purpose I rose to speak, and for none other.

I will only detain the Senate a very few moments more by referring to one other question. I care not, Mr. President, whether or not the committee act under a voluntary or compulsory system; I care not whether the penalties as provided in section 7 shall attach for failure to observe the orders of the committee—and if the penalties were greater it would make no difference as to the final result—if this bill should become a law and should go into operation, and there were no penalty whatever attached for failure to comply with the orders of the committee, if such a committee as the one which has been appointed and which is acting to-day were given jurisdiction of the subject and some company in the United States decided to issue new capital or to refund or refinance bonds which had become due, and appealed to the committee and the committee decided against them, and would not for some reason that we need not mention now "O. K." the new issue, I want to say that, under such a condition, we all know that the issue could not be successfully placed on the market.

If the committee decided against the issuing of the bonds or obligations of that company, and the company itself should say, "Well, we will put these bonds upon the market, notwithstanding the objections of the committee; we can go to some bank that has been accommodating us in the past and can borrow money from the bank again, and we do not care whether the committee approves the issue or not; we can get the money." I do not believe they could do such a thing. It has not been done in England; it has not been done in France. The bank that would undertake to buy or place securities that had been decided against by the committee would find itself, Mr. President, in a very, very delicate position when it undertook to secure credit. What would the officials of the corporation say to such bank?

Mr. OWEN. The Comptroller of the Currency would also have something to say about it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will come to that in a moment. What would the directors of the corporation say? They would immediately say, "Your institution needs no assistance, as you bought not long ago securities when it was decided that the issuing company was not to be allowed to issue them."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think what the Senator is saying is, to a very large degree at least, true with reference to the banks; but the Senator loses sight of the fact that the banks are not the only investors that it is proposed by this section of the bill to regulate. The banks are large investors in securities, but the general public is also a large investor in securities. The restraints which the Senator says would operate as against the banks investing in prohibited securities would not apply to a capitalist who had money to invest. That is one of the troubles with the voluntary system. The voluntary system, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. The voluntary system reaches rather completely the banks, and for the reason which the Senator has given, but the voluntary system does not reach the general investor at all.

This bill is not intended to include one and let another investor out, because the evil which it is sought to remedy is as great where the securities are taken by the general public as where they are taken by banks. Now, if the idea of the Senator prevails—and that idea is the basis of the voluntary system—we will have this case: One man representing not a bank but his own capital might see fit voluntarily to comply with the decrees of the committee, but another might not be so complacent and might refuse to comply, and so we would have a system which would operate to restrain one man who might, for reasons of patriotism and the public good, submit to it, but would not affect the actions of another man representing capital who was not quite so scrupulous or not quite so patriotic.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator evidently has not taken into consideration the regular course of security issues or he would never have made the statement he has made.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment, and then I will yield. There is no corporation, Mr. President, that puts forth an issue of bonds or obligations of any kind that is not in need of the money to be received from the sale of the bonds or obligations, and it must have it. There is no bond issue, to speak of, in the United States that is marketed unless it is marketed through some bank or some other agency organized to handle such securities. It is true that there are individuals who buy such obligations in small quantities, but seldom at the initial sale. I also say that the securities so disposed of amount to very little, and if that were all that we were undertaking to cover there would be no necessity whatever for this legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator mean to say that the amount of money that is invested by the general public in securities, as distinguished from the amount invested by the banks, is small? I do not think the Senator means to say that.

Mr. SMOOT. I said that under this proposed law securities passed upon by this board as unwise, whether issued by a bank, by a corporation, or by an individual, in my opinion, could not be successfully sold with an adverse report made by the issues committee.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Utah that, even as to private investors who have money to invest in stocks, no investor who has any financial knowledge or any money is going to be foolish enough to invest his money in a stock that has no bank value.

Mr. SMOOT. And in a stock that can not be sold upon a stock exchange or sold in the ordinary channels of business. An investor is not going to put his money in a security from which he can not get his money out and which he can not sell to invest in some other direction if he so desires, and if he should purchase a security that had been rejected by the committee he would purchase a security that he would have to hold indefinitely, and investors do not like to do that.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator explain this to me: If we strike out section 7 and establish what has been called the voluntary system, no limitation will be imposed by law upon any broker or upon any other person to offer to the public any security that may be issued. There will be no restriction by law; there will be no penalty. It will be voluntary; it will be dependent upon what Senators have been pleased to call patriotic sentiment, and so on. Now, Mr. President, I ask the Senator if some broker or banker offered certain securities for sale, securities, for example, of a water-power company, or a manufacturing company or whatever it might be, and I had some money to invest, and the security seemed to be an inviting one, does the Senator suppose I or he or any ordinary investor would inquire of some committee at Washington whether they had passed upon that issue? Would not the individual go ahead and buy if he thought the investment a safe and profitable one to make?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am quite sure that no investor would ever invest in a stock unless he knew something about the stock, and it seems to me that the very first question an investor would ask is, "Is this a new issue of this company? If it is, has it passed the scrutiny and has it received the approval of this board appointed by the Government of the United States to pass upon new issues of security?" Just as soon as the investor found that those securities had not received the approval of this committee appointed by the Treasury, he would decline to purchase, and for this reason——

Mr. STONE and Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield in a moment—for this reason an investor who buys stocks does not always buy them to hold; he may have a thousand dollars to-day which he knows he will have occasion to use in six months or three months, perchance, and he buys securities because of the fact that he knows he can turn the securities into money the very day he is required to raise the money he needs; and, therefore, if securities are issued and the committee acts upon them——

Mr. STONE. But I want to get to the bill itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. The result would be just the same if section 7 is adopted as it would under the so-called voluntary committee.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me at this point, what is the purpose of this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I——

Mr. STONE. Wait just a moment; let me answer it myself.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. STONE. I asked the question because I want to get at it. I ask what is the purpose of the bill? I say it is to conserve the credit of the Nation and to prevent, so far as possible, the issue and sale or offering for sale on the markets of the country of a vast amount of securities that are not considered as even contributory to the success of the war? That is, as I see it, the underlying principle of these provisions of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That is one of them.

Mr. STONE. Well, it is a great underlying principle. Mr. President, I want to know of the Senator if a man organizes a corporation to do certain things which this voluntary committee may not think contributory to the success of the war, and they advise against it, but, without legal restriction upon the freedom of individual action, he goes on doing it anyhow, and an investor is offered through a broker or a bank the securities such a man or his corporation presents to the investing public, would the investor ask what this voluntary board without official authority had said about it, or would he look at the business proposition itself and say whether he thought it safe?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It might be safe and not be contributory to the war.

Mr. STONE. Why, of course it could be safe, absolutely safe, in his opinion, at least, although it had nothing to do with the war and did not help the conduct of the war or the prosecution of the war. The object we have in putting this official board in here to control the situation is to prevent just such things as that.

Mr. SMOOT. The best answer I can give to the Senator is that the investor in England, the investor in France, the investor in Italy—and all those countries have been in greater and more dire distress for capital than we—have recognized and used this so-called voluntary system. I have read to the Senate this afternoon long lists of securities showing that in England not one pound sterling worth of such securities had been sold for 18 months, all prevented by the voluntary system, and the only restriction found necessary was the moral suasion on investors by the board telling the investors of England that the issue should not be made.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, as far as it has gone in this country, has it not worked in the same way up to this time?

Mr. SMOOT. So the testimony shows.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, has there not been a greater restriction even than that, and that is the restricted quantity of money for investment in the United Kingdom outside of war purposes?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; and we will be in that same position in a very little while.

Mr. STONE. But we are not yet.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says we are not yet. I admit it, but the only excuse for this legislation is the knowledge that we will be there if the war continues much longer. Do you think, Senators, that I would vote for the provisions of this bill if it were not absolutely necessary to save the business of this country? Many of the provisions of the bill are abhorrent to the American idea of government. But I recognize that we have got to choose between two evils. We have got to adopt such legislation or let the business of this country drift until failure overtakes it. The ability of business to secure financial assistance has been destroyed by our Government monopolizing the money market.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was interested in the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri, in which he states that the object of this bill is to restrict investments and credits. I had not supposed that that was the object of the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. That is only one of them, but not the principal one.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The title of the bill states that it is "To provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war."

I am willing to vote for a bill carrying as great powers as this does which will help finance industries necessary to the prosecution of this war; but, Mr. President, I find here, on page 14, a paragraph which evidently has not fallen under the observation of the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Missouri seems to think that if a corporation or a person issues bonds, the person to whom they are offered would look at the security offered and would govern himself according to the security offered and what he thought the market value of the security was. But here I read, on page 14, in addition to aiding all of the corporations out of the Public Treasury with the taxes collected from all the people:

> No person, firm, corporation, or association shall sell, or offer for sale or for subscription, any issue, or any part of any issue, of securities hereafter issued the par or face value of which issue shall be in excess of $100,000, except in accordance with such rules and regulations as such committee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, nor when required by such rules and regulations, except as permitted by licenses granted by such committee.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is now reading section 7?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am; and my criticism of that is this: It not only proposes to take $5,000,000,000 of the taxes of the people—or $500,000,000 at first, and ultimately, by security issues, to bring it up to five billion—to finance such corporations as this subcommittee of the Federal Reserve Board, under the thumb of the Secretary of the Treasury at every step, shall say are necessary, but it proposes to dry up and prohibit every other transaction of security issues in the country.

Have we arrived at that point in this war where it is necessary not only to tax all the people to make special loans to such corporations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall think, in his unaided opinion, are necessary to the winning of the war but to put a ban upon the issue of all other securities over $100,000 in amount, so that it shall not only be impossible for the purchaser to purchase them because this committee of the Secretary will not give them their O. K., but an inhibition is laid upon the company which is trying to struggle to its business existence against issuing over $100,000 of bonds, except it comes down here and gets a license from the Secretary of the Treasury and this committee?

If after a year or two of war the country arrives at that condition of desperation where it is necessary to dry up every source of credit in the country that is not manufacturing a technical war supply, I am willing to vote for it then; but right at the opening of the war, in the four corners of a bill which starts out to aid war industries, to have concealed in its vitals a club to kill every other industry in the country and to prevent its refunding an issue of bonds if it happens to be over $100,000, it seems to me is the height of insanity.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Connecticut, I want to say that the financial conditions existing in this country are such that some drastic measures must be passed; and it is true that one of the primary objects of this bill is to prevent the issuing of new securities that the proposed committee say should not be issued. I know that the bill places in the hands of these men a power which, if unjustly used, could bring and would bring disaster to the institutions of this country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me there, it is not a question of the unjust use of power. The Secretary and the committee are prohibited from allowing an issue of bonds unless they find it is for a particular war purpose; and every industry in the country has to be put out of business unless it has enough capital now to carry on its business as long as this law shall remain in force.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. At the very beginning of the section to which the Senator refers the purpose of this capital issues committee is defined. It is declared that this committee is created for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war and providing for the public security and the defense through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures. That is the purpose of the committee. It is created to conserve the investment capital of the Nation for war purposes. Now, it is not expected or intended that the committee will interfere in any way with the issue of securities by a concern or business whose operation is necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war. Its investigations will be confined to those concerns whose operations are not necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war. The committee is authorized to make rules and regulations to carry out this general purpose. Established business, though its operations in no way contribute to the war, is not to be disturbed. The only restraint is as to new capital expenditures after the passage of the bill. There is to be no interference with loans for renewals or borrowings in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not know whether I have made myself clear; but what I mean to say is that if this committee, in making its investigations, shall find that the concern applying for permission to make a new issue for capital expenditures is not engaged in a business whose operation is contributory to the war, and it shall find that the purpose of the issue is to enlarge and expand its business and not for the purpose of taking care of the old business, then it may determine that that issue would be incompatible with the public interest and it may prohibit it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No, Mr. President, if the Senator will submit to a correction at that point.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They can not give it a license unless they find affirmatively that it is contributing directly to the prosecution of the war. A man can not issue his securities without getting that affirmative finding. Under the provisions of the bill as drawn, unless it is amended, you could not extend a trolley road in the United States; you could not organize a gas company or a water company in the United States nor sink an oil well until this war is over. You could not issue a hundred thousand dollars of bonds for any such purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. I think they must find that the new expenditure is not compatible with the public interest before they can refuse to grant licenses, and that finding must be based upon the fact that its operations are not contributory to the war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, of course. Well, would the Secretary of the Treasury find that the extension of a trolley road in Indianapolis for 5 miles into the interior to accommodate the workers in a mill was contributory to the war? He would not do that.

Mr. SIMMONS. He would if the employees in that mill were engaged in war work or the trolley by furnishing transportation to them or in any other way contributed to the successful or efficient operation of the factory or any other war interest.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If they were employed in a war factory; yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. And if that line in a way facilitates, aids, or contributes to the successful prosecution of this war enterprise by affording transportation to men or material necessary to its operations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It will strangle every kind of business except that which is directly engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war. The Secretary's decision is unreviewable; and what men can get capital for any enterprise depends upon just the way it strikes him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is entirely wrong about that. I do not think that in effect the action of the proposed committee would be materially different from that of the committee that is now organized and operating in an unofficial way to accomplish the same purpose. The purpose is to give the sanction of law to what that voluntary committee is doing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I recognize that something must be done to relieve the business interests of this country from the burdens that have fallen upon them. The Government of the United States has completely monopolized the money market, and every issue of liberty bonds hereafter will restrict the money market that commercial institutions have used in the past to extend their business and carry on their regular trade. As I said before, unless legislation of this character is passed, the business of this country can not survive if the war should continue a year or longer.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator, then, to take the position that it is absolutely essential in this condition, in order to conserve the capital of the country, that there should be some power somewhere that can exercise a supervision and a regulatory control over the issues of unnecessary capital?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it in my mind, and the Secretary of the Treasury to-day has provided a committee for that very purpose. I think that the action taken by the present committee will be just as restrictive on the business interests of this country in their future issues of indebtedness as if we passed this law, and it contained section 7 and section 8, creating a committee, and also imposing penalties for the violation of the law. That is my position. I know that something has to be done, and of the two evils—on the one hand, doing nothing, and on the other hand voting for legislation which, in my opinion, in some of its provisions is vicious in the extreme—I would prefer to do the latter a thousand times than to see a panic in the United States that would destroy the business and the productivity of our institutions that contributes to the making of munitions of war and other articles necessary to the carrying on of the war successfully.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, if he thinks that it is absolutely necessary in some way or other to accomplish this purpose of restricting unnecessary investments, if the Senator approves of the committee that is now doing that very thing, why does he denounce as vicious the legislation which simply provides that that shall be legal?

Mr. SMOOT. I referred to certain provisions of the bill when I designated it as vicious.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator, with reference to the other provisions of the bill, to say that while in ordinary times he would not give it his sanction and support, in these conditions he held that it was necessary, and that he was in favor of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely. That is what I said and what I say again.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I think the Senator ought to withdraw his remark that the provisions of section 8, which simply make lawful a thing that is now being done without the sanction of law, are vicious.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, I never made any such statement as that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator used that very word.

Mr. SMOOT. I never referred to any particular section of the bill. I referred to the legislation as a whole, and I still take that position.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to put a question to the Senator, if I will not interrupt the thread of his discourse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. I do. I will say to the Senator that I was through with what I had to say.

Mr. REED. Let us assume that it was proposed to pass a law to create a board consisting of three members of the Federal Reserve Board and two other men to be selected by some officer of the Government—say that the board in itself would be a board of great standing and weight—and it was proposed to confer upon that board the right to make a list of those securities of the United States which were regarded by the board as sound. Does not the Senator believe that that would be equivalent to putting upon the blacklist every security not so listed?

Mr. SMOOT. I have stated that in substance, Mr. President, and I really believe it. No matter whether there is a penalty attached or not, the securities that were disapproved of by this committee, or even by the committee that we have now in the Treasury of the United States, could not be successfully sold in the market of the United States any more than the securities have been sold in England of which the English committee has not approved.

Mr. REED. Now, is it not also true, in the opinion of the Senator, that if the proposition were baldly made to create a board or a committee and to authorize it to publish a blacklist of securities of the United States, it would, under normal conditions, be regarded as a monstrous proposition?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of it, Mr. President; and this whole bill would be considered in the same light in ordinary times. There is only one excuse for this legislation, and that is that it is the only way in which money can be secured to be advanced to the commerce of this country that will enable it to carry on the regular trade of the country and to make the expansions that are absolutely necessary.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I wondered a moment ago if our policy should be to create or authorize the creation of a voluntary board with the tremendous power of making a list of securities that might be offered for sale and blacklisting all others——

Mr. SMOOT. In substance.

Mr. STONE. Well, the Senator says "in substance"; I say "blacklisting all others." If this Federal voluntary board should be clothed with this enormous power, would it not in fact be more dangerous than the official board provided for in this bill, with a well-defined statutory authority?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it would be just the same. I do not think it would make any difference.

Mr. STONE. Well, I think the so-called voluntary board would be far more dangerous.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not.

Mr. STONE. And yet I understood my friend from Utah rather to favor the voluntary board upon the idea that it could accomplish the desired result by blacklisting everything it did not indorse. Mr. President, I can not conceive of the idea of setting up a mere voluntary organization, in a large sense irresponsible, that would undertake to say to the vast investing interests of the United States that this or that particular thing is proper and safe, but that everything that does not have their indorsement is unfit, and therefore blacklisted. I do not see how a more dangerous power could be conferred upon any body of men, and I confess I would rather have a body such as is provided for in this bill, an authorized body, regulated by law, and with legal responsibility clearly and definitely defined, than to have this thing that the Senator from Utah and other Senators seem to prefer.

As a matter of choice between the two, I hesitate not to say I prefer the board provided for in the bill than such a board as the Senator suggests, with unrestricted and unregulated powers; no definite powers; just something invested in them to put the stamp of their approval or disapproval, directly or indirectly, upon what is going on, and at their pleasure. I would rather have a board that was more authoritative and responsible.

Senators, there ought to be no differences between us about this. We should want simply to get at the best plan; that is all. That is where we all stand, I hope, and I think that is where we do stand.

Mr. President, when we brought this bill from the Committee on Finance, when, without a dissenting vote, we authorized the Senator from North Carolina, chairman of the committee, to report it, I thought, so far as the committee were concerned, that we were in substantial accord. I am somewhat surprised that we now are brought up, for some reason—some reason that I do not understand—to face an opposition, an apparent opposition even from the members of the committee.

Mr. President, before the consideration of this bill is concluded, if I have the opportunity—although it is not unlikely that I will waive the privilege if we can get a vote—I have it in mind to state the reasons why I support this bill, not the reasons why it might be opposed, as some members of the committee seem to be doing. For myself I say that as a member of the committee I came out here behind the chairman to support the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no quarrel with the Senator from Missouri. The Senator has a perfect right to believe that the committee provided for in section 7 is less dangerous than a voluntary committee. The only difference between us is that I can not agree with the position taken by him. I do not believe the voluntary committee is more dangerous; I believe it is less so, and I believe also that it will bring the same result that we are trying to attain in the passage of this bill.

I desire to state to the Senator that whether section 7 remains in the bill or not I am going to vote for the bill. I have stated the reason why I shall so many times this afternoon that I do not think it necessary to repeat it now. I never intended to say what I have this afternoon, but I have been forced to by questions asked me and statements made by Senators.

I simply rose, Mr. President, to state that in my opinion the position taken by the Senator from Oklahoma that he would support section 7 of the bill and would oppose section 8 of the bill seemed to me was inconsistent. I simply wanted to express that opinion before the vote was taken on this amendment.

That is the position, Mr. President, that I wanted to have the Senate understand that I took in relation to those sections. I think I said to the chairman last week, or a day or two after the consideration of the bill began, that I concluded that I would not say a word about the bill and allow it to come to a vote just as quickly as possible. I had intended to speak upon the bill and I had intended to say why I thought the legislation ought to pass and let it rest with that. I have said it in so many different ways this afternoon and in a chopped up fashion that I do not know whether it was understood by all or not, but I still claim, no matter whether section 7 is in, no matter whether section 8 is in, no matter whether it is made even worse than it is written to-day by the committee or even in the form that it came from the Treasury, Mr. President, no one informed of present conditions doubts the absolute necessity of some such legislation in order that the commerce of the country may be provided with the necessary financial assistance to keep it from failing. Therefore I am going to vote for the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I share the surprise of the distinguished Senator from Missouri that any member of the Finance Committee dares oppose this bill in any form or in any line. The Senator from Missouri knows, as we all know, that the Finance Committee is one of the old, reliable, well-disciplined committees of the Senate; that there are 17 members on it true and tried; and when a measure is brought down here drafted by the assistant solicitor of one of the bureaus they are supposed to take it up and put it through, whether they like it or not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the statement of the Senator that the committee is a well-disciplined committee and that whenever the Treasury Department or any other department of the Government brings a bill down here the committee passes it is unwarranted, unjust, unfair, and I resent it.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very much surprised that the Senator does not agree with me. That has been my observation. There are 17——

Mr. SIMMONS. I insist that no Senator on this floor has a right to impugn the motive, the integrity, or independence of a committee of this body.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what the remarks of the Senator implied, if they implied anything at all.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have the floor. I have not impugned anybody's motives. I have been placing before the Senate the result of my observation that the Senate Committee on Finance is an old, reliable committee, well disciplined; that it stands together; and when they come to report a measure, the members of it all understand they should not criticize it; they should not oppose the action of the committee in any regard; and I was particularly surprised at the Senator from North Dakota——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, no suggestion of that sort was made. The only suggestion that has been made here by the Senator from Missouri was to the effect that he was surprised that a member of the committee who supported this bill in the committee should be opposing it upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am expressing my own surprise and astonishment now, and if I have not the support of the Senator from Missouri any more I should like to express it still further.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have belonged to a great many committees during my long service in the Senate and I belong to quite a number now, but I never in my life when I dissented in committee from any provisions of a bill but permitted it to be reported thereby yielded my judgment, nor do I yield my judgment in reference to this bill. I was opposed in committee to sections 7 and 8. I am still opposed to them, and no committee or member of a committee can call my action in question because I do not follow the majority of the committee in the consideration of the measure.

I wish to say, furthermore, that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] specifically reserved the right when we were considering this bill to oppose the sections in the Senate if he concluded to do so.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am glad to have the Senator from Utah exonerated. I hope there will be others who will dare to declare their independence of the action of the committee and vote as they really think on this bill. It is not only insubordination to the decree of the committee but it is insubordination to those who have proposed this bill. I have just ascertained that it was drafted by the assistant solicitor in one of the departments, but it was suggested and brought to life last October by a very distinguished gentleman, and he among others has appeared in conference with some of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency yesterday and to-day, and we have learned from him the things that must be put through and the things that we are allowed to debate on the floor of the Senate. Section 8 was brought up and he was asked whether it was not rather a severe penalty to put a man in State's prison for four years for disobeying a regulation of a committee, and he said yes, that that was one of the things that might be left with the Senate to decide, but not section 7. He never suggested that we were at liberty to discuss section 7, and that is what I want to criticize the Senator from North Dakota for. We were discussing section 8. That is on the program, but no one told us that we could discuss section 7, and we have been discussing it all this afternoon.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator tell me who this distinguished gentleman is?

Mr. HOLLIS. Oh, no; that is not permitted. It is not good form. You must not do that. All you can do is to hint, and I have just hinted.

Mr. STONE. I understood the Senator to say that this distinguished gentleman appeared before the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; but he was one of several, so that we can conceal his identity. It is not right to tell who he was.

Mr. STONE. There can be no play about this. If a man appeared before the committee and made a statement such as the Senator has made here, I would be very pleased to know who he is.

Mr. HOLLIS. But the Senator can not find out from me My lips are sealed.

Mr. STONE. Why are your lips sealed?

Mr. HOLLIS. Because I say so. That is the only reason I can give. They are sealed. As a gentleman I must play the game as it is played.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Did not the committee have the observations of those who appeared before it taken down?

Mr. HOLLIS. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We had the hearings in the Finance Committee reported and printed.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; but these were not taken down. It was a conference. It was not a committee hearing. It was a conference; it did not bind anybody, and it was not taken down. It might be very interesting to discuss why it is necessary to establish a United States bank in Washington, so that anyone who wants to borrow any money can kowtow to the five gentlemen who are running this great bank. We must not discuss that. It might be interesting to decide on its merits how the capital issues committee was to be appointed. It is to be appointed by a board of gentlemen over whom we have no control at all; that is, by the Federal Reserve Board, and it must be composed of three of their own members, and they can go and pick out two others. Now, some think it would be a fine idea to have the President appoint them and the Senate confirm them, if it sees fit, but we must not discuss that. We might adopt some other way in which to appoint this committee. We might think that their authority is too extensive. All they have got to decide on is whether business is essential or nonessential, and that is a very serious thing. I might think some business was essential to winning the war, but I have to go to this committee, appointed by a board over which the Senate has no control, and they can ruin me or make me, just as they see fit, and there is no appeal to anyone. But I will not suggest this question. Some one will get interested and discuss it. I beg to return to the program. You are allowed to discuss section 8 as between one year and four years, and I deprecate the suggestion that section 7 ought to be discussed or stricken from the bill. I hope the Senate will get back to its mutton.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply want to say a word. Of course, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] can cast reflections upon the heads of departments of the Government and denounce them as autocrats and as attempting to dictate or stifle legislation if he desires. That is his affair and his responsibility. I do not think anybody will agree with him in the insinuations he has made against them, nor do I think the country will respond to that sort of an attack upon men who are serving the Government as well and as faithfully as are the heads of the departments of the Government at this time.

But when the Senator assumes to attack a committee of this body in the way the Senator attacked the Finance Committee, I think he transcends the rights and privileges of a Senator upon this floor. His language and insinuations flagrantly violate the well-established rules of this body, and if it was thought proper or expedient to do so, I think he would be subject to be called to order. I did not see fit to pursue that course.

I want to express now, as strongly as I can, my resentment to his reflections upon the integrity and the independence of the Finance Committee. No committee in this body has exercised greater independence of action and of decision than that committee.

Some time ago that committee, since my chairmanship of it, had under consideration a tariff bill which probably was very largely framed by the Treasury Department; most of these fiscal bills are in the first instance, whether they be appropriation or tariff or financial bills. When we had under consideration one of those tariff bills, after the House had acted upon and amended it, and it was sent to the Senate, the Finance Committee reported it back to the Senate with nearly 600 amendments, and the great bulk of those amendments were adopted.

No important bill of the character that is generally framed by the department has been reported to the Senate from the Finance Committee since I have been a member of it, so far as I recall, without the recommendation of material emendation. Members of the Finance Committee will bear me out in the statement that though this bill was sent here as an administration measure—and I am glad it was sent, because I think some of its provisions are entitled to be characterized as an inspiration in their adoption and efficacy to meet a very acute and a very difficult situation—the committee did not, as the Senator intimates, tamely acquiesce in all its provisions nor deal with it differently than a bill presented by an individual Senator; the very nature and character of the two sections under discussion was changed. The whole of one of these sections was rewritten. Not these, but many other sections, were materially amended and others rewritten, every member of the committee exercising the utmost independence in criticizing and offering amendments, and they were adopted or rejected, as they were thought to be well or ill founded by the committee. There was no partisanship or cringing, but absolute freedom of action in all its considerations and actions in respect to this measure and its amendment. This bill was reported back to the Senate with the consent and sanction practically of the whole committee.

Mr. President, it is true that while this committee report was a unanimous report, signifying that it had as a whole the sanction of every member of the committee, some members of the committee stated in committee, as is usual under those circumstances, that while they approved of the bill as a whole they did not approve of certain amendments to the bill, and so reserved the right to oppose those amendments upon the floor of the Senate.

When the Senator from Missouri apparently criticized the attitude of the Senator from Utah he was under the impression that that Senator did not know he had reserved such right with respect to this amendment, and he was under the impression the Senator from Utah had supported this amendment in the committee, and laboring under this erroneous impression he expressed surprise at the action of the Senator in opposing the amendment.

I do not at all impugn the right of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] as a member of the committee to exercise his full independence upon this floor, although he approved the bill as a whole, and for that reason agreed to the report of the committee.

Mr. STONE. I think so, whether he reserved the right or not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I have no doubt he may rightfully do it, whether he reserved the right or not. Nobody has questioned that. Because of the criticism of the Senator from Missouri, based on a misapprehension, as I stated, the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] seizes upon the circumstance to indict the Finance Committee both before the country and the Senate as so subservient and disciplined that it habitually accepts every bill sent to it by the departments and votes for these measures just as reported. A Senator suggests to me that his voice will not reach the country. His voice will not reach the country when he engages in unjust and unfair and unfounded criticism, either of the members of a great committee of this body or the head of one of the great departments of the Government.

Mr. President, I have said this much because my resentment is somewhat hot at the course which the Senator has seen fit to pursue in the matter, a nagging course, nagging the committee and nagging the department, and trying to put men in high place, with heavy responsibilities, in a false position before the country. I think I am warranted in displaying some heat about it, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senate if I have spoken with unwarranted heat, for I did not wish to display any temper in the matter; I simply desired to give emphatic expression to my feelings of surprise and resentment and nothing more.

Mr. President, as the hour is late, and I know a number of Senators have left not expecting that this rather important amendment would be voted upon to-day, I will move a recess.

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator makes that motion will he allow me two minutes?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. I only wanted to say, Mr. President, that in my experience in the Senate the fact that a committee votes to report a bill favorably and there is no minority report never implies that every member of the committee is bound to vote for every amendment and every section of the bill just as it comes from the committee. It is the custom to reserve the right to offer amendments and to vote against an amendment on the floor. In this particular case that reservation was made.

Mr. President, as far as discipline goes I have never observed any attempt to discipline anybody on the Finance Committee. We have had great differences of opinion there and long discussions, more than in any committee on which I have ever had the opportunity of serving. We have done very hard work, and I think that there has been an abundance of independence shown, although no party feeling has been shown since this war began. I think, Mr. President, that members of the Finance Committee are perhaps quite as free from outside dictation as are some of those who criticize us. I have never observed any sign in the Finance Committee of outside dictation either from departments or from organizations which are in the departments. I have never seen any successful attempt to dictate to members of the committee.

I feel much honored by being a member of the committee on account of the work which it has done during the past year; and, if I may make one general observation, I think it is a mistake that it does not advance good legislation, that it does not advance that spirit which I think we all ought to have at this time in the Senate—a spirit of real unity—to make personal attacks on a committee and to jeer at it because most of its members have had the honor to be returned many times to the Senate instead of only once. I think it is possible for a man to have served long in the Senate and to give honest and useful service. I quite understand the feelings of the chairman, who has worked so exceptionally hard over the bills which have been before us, and who, I should like to take this opportunity of saying, has been so extremely considerate to all the members of the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I did not jeer at the committee; I did not criticize them; but it is a fact that when an important bill comes on the floor of the United States Senate we find a committee like the Finance Committee voting almost solidly. That is so much required or expected of them that when a member of the committee says that he is not going to support a certain measure reported by the committee it is cause for surprise on the part of another member.

With 17 members of the committee voting solidly for a bill—that is about one-third or one-fourth of the Members who are usually voting—it gives very little opportunity for free, fair discussion and decision on the floor of the Senate.

I deprecate any attempt in a measure of this kind to bind 17 members of the Finance Committee to all of the provisions of the bill. My remarks were made to bring that fact before the Senate. I think it is a just criticism, and I cleave to it. I have no criticism to make of the members of the committee individuall . It is their collective action that I find to be sometimes injurious.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the criticism in itself is the highest possible tribute to the committee, because there can be no higher tribute to the merits of a bill than that 17 members, from as many diverse parts of the country, representing two great political parties and several factions within each party, should come with a united front to vote for the bill as a whole, and with only, I believe, 2, or possibly 3, members expressing difference of opinion as to particular provisions of the bill. So far from the fact that a committee vote solidly for a bill being a reason to criticize either the committee or the bill, it is a proof almost positive of the fact that the bill must be one of exceptional merit or else that could not have occurred.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, as we are all making explanations, confessions, and protests, being a member of the committee, let me make one.

I have never supported either slavishly or otherwise everything in a Finance Committee bill since I have been here unless the Democratic caucus ordered me to do so. I have never yielded my convictions to a majority when it existed as to the expediency or the right of anything which a majority of the committee thought otherwise about. I have never impeded legislation except on one occasion, and that was legislation reported by a committee with which I had nothing to do.

I have in the case of this bill objected to some of its terms, and have offered and have succeeded in having the Senate accept certain amendments which seemed to me to be desirable to certain parts of the bill. So I must deny the sweeping statement of my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] when he asserts here that this committee and all of its members slavishly follow the report of the committee, stand by the bill in solid mass, and obey the orders of the Treasury Department.

I wear no man's collar here, nor the collar of any committee. While I shall continue to do my duty on the committee and acquiesce in the report of any bill which a majority desires to report, or which it thinks it is its duty to report, I shall advocate and support its various provisions, provided only they address themselves to my better judgment. Otherwise I shall not do so.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 6, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 5, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, impress us as a people, with all the spiritual fervor of Thy power, with the stupendous task which has been thrust upon us, that every man, woman, and child throughout the length and breadth of the land may be impressed with the sacrifices, which he or she may be called upon to make, in the great struggle which confronts us.

Let those who can work give themselves with patriotic zeal to the necessities of the hour. Let those who can fight give themselves heart and soul to the cause. Let those who can minister to the sick and wounded and comfort the dying give themselves whole-heartedly to their calling, that we may defend with all the physical, intellectual, moral, spiritual power the precious heritage of our fathers—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—not only for ourselves but for humanity, after the manner of the Lord Jesus Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 133. Joint resolution authorizing the granting of insurance under the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved October 6, 1917, on application by a person other than the person to be insured.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 133. Joint resolution authorizing the granting of insurance under the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved October 6, 1917, on application by a person other than the person to be insured; referred to Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

READMISSION OF CERTAIN ALIENS.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up House joint resolution 255, authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or allied forces.

It is a joint resolution which authorizes the readmission to the United States at the close of the war, or when they shall have been discharged for wounds or other physical reasons, certain aliens, notwithstanding the act of April 6, 1917, they having gone into the Army of the United States or into that of the cobelligerents.

Mr. GILLETT. Let the joint resolution be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of the immigration act of February 5, 1917, excluding from the United States aliens who are likely to become a public charge, or who are physically defective, or who are contract laborers, or who have come in consequence of advertisements for labor printed, published, or distributed in a foreign country, or who are assisted by others to come, or whose ticket or passage is paid for with the money of another or by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign government, or who are stowaways, or who are illiterate, aliens lawfully resident in the United States when heretofore or hereafter enlisted or conscripted for the military service of the United States; and aliens lawfully resident in the United States who, prior to April 6, 1917, declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and who have enlisted for service with Czecko-Slovak, Polish, or other independent forces attached to the United States Army or to the army of any one of the cobelligerents of the United States in the present war, who may, within one year after the termination of the war, apply for readmission to this country, after being honorably discharged or granted furlough abroad by the proper military authorities, or after being rejected on final examination in connection with their enlistment or conscription, shall be readmitted; and that any alien of either of the two foregoing descriptions who would otherwise be excluded under said section of the immigration act on the ground that he is idiotic, imbecile, feeble-minded, epileptic, insane, or has had one or more attacks of insanity, or on the ground that he is afflicted with constitutional psychopathic inferiority, tuberculosis, a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, or mental defect, shall be readmitted if it is proved that the disability was acquired while the alien was serving in the military forces of the United States or in an independent force of the kind hereinbefore described, if such alien returns to a port of the United States within one year after the termination of the war; and that the head tax provided in the immigration act of February 5, 1917, shall not be collected from aliens readmitted into the United States under the provisions of this resolution: Provided, That if any alien readmitted to the United States in pursuance of the terms hereof shall at any time thereafter become a public charge the expense of maintenance and care shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas if this joint resolution, in part, does not cover the conditions provided for in a bill passed by the House yesterday?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No, Mr. Speaker; I do not think it does. I just talked that matter over briefly with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], who is of the committee that reported the other bill. He can more clearly explain the terms of that bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I remember the terms of that bill very well.

Mr. SLAYDEN. This joint resolution treats of two classes of aliens in the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will permit me, the bill of yesterday was to admit them to citizenship, and this joint resolution is merely to admit them into this country.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize that this joint resolution provides for men who volunteered into the service of the United States as well as in the service of the allies.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not catch the gentleman's remark.

Mr. MADDEN. The joint resolution says "those hereafter enlisted or conscripted for the military service of the United States and aliens lawfully resident in the United States." The question is whether that part of the joint resolution is not covered by the bill which we passed yesterday.

Mr. SLAYDEN. This is not to make them citizens, but to readmit them.

Mr. MADDEN. I think myself the readmission of men who have volunteered to serve in defense of the cause in which the United States is engaged, who have been in the country but are not citizens of the country, should be dealt with as a matter of simple justice through the provisions of this joint resolution, and there ought not to be any serious opposition to the joint resolution; but I was wondering, when I asked the question, whether it did not also include some of those who were covered by the bill yesterday.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That bill was to admit them to citizenship.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas whether, in case the joint resolution is considered by the House, he would consent to the elimination of the words, in lines 16, 17, and 18, "or after being rejected on final examination in connection with their enlistment or conscription, shall be readmitted"?

These words seem to give immunity to a man who has never been in the military service, whose application for military service must be difficult to prove, and for whom it would seem no special ground or favor of this kind was necessary or proper.

Mr. MADDEN. At the same time, if the gentleman will allow me, he did the best he could to surrender his life to the cause of the allies. He was in this country, he went abroad voluntarily, and if, after having done everything he could to get into the Army, he is to be discriminated against because he did try to do the thing he ought to do, I think it would be unjust.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that this joint resolution is going to cause considerable discussion.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution has just been reported, and I would like to have some information about it. I think it should go over for a day or two.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. For the time being I object.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 10358, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, when we completed consideration of the bill the other day we had just read the paragraph on page 17, ending at line 20. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he can inform me which of the employees in this paragraph are the barbers in the House Office Building.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Those are appropriated for on page 17, lines 5 and 6.

Mr. WALSH. Are they among the cloakroom men?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; they are known as cloakroom men.

Mr. WALSH. Is this one at $600 and $120 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is one of them.

Mr. WALSH. He is a barber?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and the others are carried at $600 each.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, in line 4, page 17, to strike out the figure "8" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "7," and, in line 5, to strike out the words and figures "one $600 and $120 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent," and to strike out the word "seven" and insert "four."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 17, line 4, strike out the figure "8" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "7"; line 5, after the word "men," strike out "one $600 and $120 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent," and, in line 6, after the word "and," strike out the word "seven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I remember several years ago reading a speech delivered in the House by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], who at that time—I think it was during the Fifty-sixth Congress—directed attention to the enormous expenditures which were being made by the Government in order to support the legislative and executive branches of the Government; and he called attention to the various employees that were required and the salaries that were paid to them. It seems to me that in a time like this we Members of the House can afford to forego some of the luxuries, and I presume that these barbers might be classed as luxuries, because they are paid for by the Government, although we pay them for the individual services which they render when we are permitted to enter their establishment. It seems to me that we might relieve the people at large from this tax that is imposed upon them, particularly in view of the fact, as I said before, that we pay for the services they render; and I understand that in one of the shops there is one barber who receives no compensation except that which he gets from the Members who patronize the establishment. I understand that the others receive salaries, and it is presumed that the services which they render in cleaning up and keeping their shop clean and neat and tidy early in the morning and in the afternoon after they have closed the place is sufficient to warrant us in carrying them in this bill as cloakroom men, or cleaners-up. I believe it is time, if we are going to carry them as barbers, to say so and denominate them as such in the legislation, and let our constituents know that we are paying for barbers, even though they perform no work for us gratis.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask this question for information. Are the barbers in the shop here in the Capitol Building included in lines 5 and 6?

Mr. WALSH. I understand not. I asked first with reference to the barbers in the House Office Building, and that was the information given.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then I gave the gentleman incorrect information. I understood the gentleman referred to the barbers here in the Capitol.

Mr. WALSH. No; I referred to the barbers in the House Office Building, but I intend to offer a similar amendment with reference to those in the Capitol.

Mr. HAMLIN. I agree very largely with what the gentleman has said, but I wanted to call attention to the fact that if the barbers in the Capitol Building are included in these lines, then they are charged with the responsibility of cleaning this Hall in addition to their barber shop. They are compelled to either personally come here each day and clean this Hall or else hire it done out of their own pockets.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the amendment that I have offered strikes out the barbers in the Capitol?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I intended to make that motion also, but I intended to do so first in reference to the House Office Building. Let me suggest to the gentleman that I understand that we give them the use of the quarters; we furnish them with the linen, with the light, with the heat, with the water, and that they come up here and ply their occupation, and each Member has to pay the same price for the work they do that he would have to pay if he went into a barber shop in another section of the city; and if the privilege which we give them to occupy those quarters, to ply their occupation there, to perform the services for Members of the House, is not worth their cleaning up the building in the vicinity of that shop and the keeping of that shop tidy and neat, then I say that we could afford to pay charwomen $20 a month to perform that service in the halls approaching them or else impose that duty on some of the other janitors or messengers of these various committees that are overloaded with janitors and messengers.

Mr. HAMLIN. What I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to is to draw a distinction between the barbers in the Capitol Building who are limited to the membership of the House when they come to shaving anyone, who are not permitted to shave anyone else than Members—if Members do not keep them busy they have nothing to do at all—and the barbers over in the House Office Building, who have no other work to do except to follow their trade. These barbers in the Capitol Building have to clean this hall. The barbers in the House Office Building can shave anyone who comes along, while these barbers can not.

Mr. WALSH. I admit that possibly the barbers down here have a little more to do, but I do not admit that there is any justification for carrying this class of employees as laborers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman aware that these barbers, excepting when Congress is in session, have practically no work to do in the barber shop, not only here in the Members' shop but over in the office building; there are a few clerks there, but they can not get any outside trade at all, especially downstairs here.

Mr. WALSH. But that has not been so for some little time; but even if they have no work to do I do not think we should carry them on the pay roll.

Mr. BROWNING. And that at that time they are janitors; that they have to move furniture and do all kinds of work; they are laborers.

Mr. WALSH. If Congress is not in session, it does not require any more cleaning up or moving of furniture or any more janitor service than when Congress is in session.

Mr. BROWNING. That is where the gentleman is mistaken. It is when Congress is not in session that the changing of all of the furniture in the building and the cleaning up occurs, and then they become laborers, especially those downstairs. I am not speaking of those in the Office Building.

Mr. WALSH. I submit if that be so we might transfer this troublesome task of moving furniture to some of these overworked janitors at $1,000 per year who are being carried upon the rolls for some of these committees that have not filed any reports, or have filed but few during this session of Congress, and that are not holding hearings, but I submit it is a deception to carry these men in this bill as laborers, and pay them as laborers at $720 per year for one of them and the other at $50 a month, when a greater part of their time is being devoted to their occupation of barbering and that they then receive the fees that are customary for Members to pay for that work. I say, as I said before, while it does not amount to very much in the main, that at this crisis it is a good example for the House to set to economize here and there wherever possible within its own establishment and not let it be said that we during this war session, when taxes are being levied and when appeals are being made for every sort of charity, are not willing to economize and cut down in our expenses and to dispense with the services of barbers carried upon the roll as cloak-room men when a greater part of their time is occupied for their own private gain. If we give them the use and occupany of these rooms, with the furnishings and equipment, it must be worth something, as to procure similar quarters elsewhere would amount to a considerable item in the way of rent.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts think other barbers would be glad to have those stands down there even if no pay was given to them?

Mr. WALSH. I have no doubt plenty of competent men would be glad to have those quarters for a barber shop and to perform incidental janitor service as a remuneration for the privilege of performing such services.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman is not retaliating and giving these barbers the same kind of a deal they gave when they got at him with a razor?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; I do not know what treatment they give, as I seldom patronize them.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. GOOD. Has the gentleman considered this fact, that on the 4th of March next Congress will adjourn until some time in December? During that time this Hall must be kept clean. Other work around the Capitol must be performed by these four men. They can not perform very much work then and barber. They are not allowed to go into business generally down here and serve the public, therefore they will have no compensation during that time Congress is not in session, and yet they are performing a work here that the Government must have performed and for which it must pay.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not contend that these four men that he speaks of are the only ones employed around this Capitol or the House Office Building that can be secured to come in here and keep this Chamber clean when Congress is not in session?

Mr. GOOD. These four men are the only men on the pay roll, as I understand it, whose duty it is to keep this room in order.

Mr. WALSH. That does not answer my question. Does the gentleman say that there are no other men to whom this duty could be transferred? It certainly does not require as many to keep the House Chamber clean when we are not in session as when we are meeting every day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the effect of the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, as explained by him, would be to dispense with four laborers now employed and who during a part of the day run the barber shop here in the Capitol. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, as Members of the House will recall, that in 1912 when this side of the House came into control there was a reorganization of the employees of this House and at that time 62 employees of the House were dropped from the rolls whose salaries aggregated $82,750 every year.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. How many have been added since that time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. None to this particular roll. There have been some special police——

Mr. MADDEN. How many more employees are there in the House organization now than there were before?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman I am confident there are a good many less; there is not any question about that.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman state as a fact that there are less?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There are less, a good deal less, I will say to the gentleman, and I have no hesitancy in making that statement. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts proceeds on the wrong assumption. In the first place he proceeds upon the idea that those four laborers do nothing else but attend upon the barber shop for which he says they receive pay from those who call upon them for their services, but I want to submit to him and to the House that these laborers are very necessary. As a matter of fact if his motion should prevail it would be necessary for the House to provide four laborers in order to do the work that these men are now performing at $600 a year, and when we provide four laborers it will be necessary to pay them $720 a year instead of $600, that being the amount that is paid to other laborers.

Mr. DYER. That does not apply to the barbers of the House Office Building, but to those in the Capitol?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was speaking particularly of the barbers in the Capitol itself.

Mr. DYER. Those in the House Office Building do not do work as laborers.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am informed to the contrary; but the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is directed particularly at the barbers of the Capitol Building, and I am confining these remarks to them.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. This is a barberous discussion, but then there is one bit of information we have not got. Is it not true that the men of the House Office Building out of what they are paid pay the salaries of the two men here in the toilet room? Are not they employed by those men over there and are they paid by these men downstairs?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; they are not.

Mr. MEEKER. Are they paid by the men downstairs?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In the toilet room of the House?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are employees of the House and carried on the roll. Now, gentlemen, four of the laborers are employed in the Members' private shop in the Capitol. Their duties are, as stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], to clean up the House floor and keep it in proper condition, and that is what they are charged with doing every day. They work here in the morning, they work late in the evening, in order to get the floor of this House cleaned for the business of the succeeding day. I repeat that if you drop these four laborers from the roll, then it will be necessary to provide laborers to take care of this floor.

Mr. RUCKER. You have reference to the four laborers downstairs?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. How many months has the House been in session? It has been in session a large part of the time during the last four years.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. With the exception of one vacation, which ran from March to December.

Mr. RUCKER. There has been very little recess.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Comparatively; yes.

Mr. RUCKER. If it requires four men to do this work during that short time——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. If it requires a forenoon of a day for four men to do the work, would it be necessary to employ four men solely for that work if they were changed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am informed by the Doorkeeper that if they were dropped, he would have to have four laborers to do this work.

Mr. RUCKER. Does not the gentleman know, as far as the work in the Hall is concerned, it could be done by one man?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER. By two, then?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know; but I do know that these men are engaged, early in the morning and late in the evening, cleaning up this entire floor and galleries.

And I want to say to the gentleman, in response to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that these men get a certain amount of income by virtue of the barbering they do. Now, as a matter of fact, we know that their custom is necessarily limited to such portion of the membership as patronize them. And I venture the assertion if they were taken from the roll it would be impossible to secure anyone to come up here and run that shop.

The gentleman refers to the fact that they are furnished the room, the heat, the linen, and the light. That is true. A few years ago they were furnished their supplies, but that has been cut out, and now they get only the room, the heat, the light, and the necessary linen. But I submit if you undertake to remove them from the roll you will have to supply four laborers to do the work they are now doing, and in addition to that you will not be able to secure men on the outside to come up and run the barber shop.

Mr. RUCKER. As far as I am concerned, I would like to see it tried once.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Has the gentleman any information as to how much time these four laborers occupy in cleaning up this Hall?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have not. But I will say to the gentleman it must take considerable time. It is a large Hall, and I dare say it requires considerable cleaning at the end of each day's session. I think anybody would agree with me in that statement.

Mr. WALSH. But four men are able to do it. They have the whole forenoon, when the House is not in session.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand they work at night frequently. This has to be done to avoid dust in the day. I will say to the gentleman that this arrangement has been going on for some time, and these men have been carried on the roll in this way for more than 20 years.

Mr. WALSH. That is not conclusive.

Mr. HAMLIN. I know very little about the barbers over at the House Office Building, but I made some inquiries quite a while ago as to the barbers in the shop in this building, their duties and what compensation they received, and so forth. Now, they tell me down there that they are compelled to clean this Hall, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] says, and I am sure it is no light job, because I have been through here when they were at work on it and I know it is considerable work in picking up papers, dusting, and cleaning the desks and seats, and so on, while Congress is in session. They tell me down there unless they come and do it themselves they have to hire somebody to do it and pay them out of their own pockets.

Now, there is another thing to think about. We will not permit them to serve anybody but Members. If there are a half dozen Members who come there to be shaved during the day they can serve them. Otherwise they get nothing at all in the way of compensation for their services as barbers. When Congress is not in session, I am told by them, that it is their duty to clean these corridors, clean the cuspidors, move furniture, and do every thing else incident to the work of a janitor, because they are carried on the janitor's roll and are under his supervision and control.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] says that that work might be performed by some of these janitors that are assigned to committees that seldom meet and have very little work to do. I want to say to him this, that I know something about one of those committees that does not meet frequently, but that committee does not enjoy the luxury of a janitor.

There is a janitor to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department in connection with the six or seven other committees. One man takes care of six or seven different committee rooms and carries the mail—the mail of all of these committees—for the pay of a common laborer so that it is not accurate to say, and I did not want the information to go out unchallenged, that these so-called expenditure committees have each a janitor, because we have not. We have one taking care of six or seven different committees.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. WALSH. I did not refer to any of the expenditure committees.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am glad to hear that, but I thought that inference might be drawn.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. In the paragraph beginning at the bottom of page 14, running to page 15, there is provision made for 35 committees. The janitors in 12 of those are paid $1,000, and those in the remaining 25 are paid only $60 a month. Some of these committees, I notice in looking them over, are inactive and have no duties at all. There is $3,480 expended. Why do we not make it a uniform charge and save that money?

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has suggested to me that you are asking the wrong man about that. I do not know about that myself.

Mr. ROBBINS. You are defending certain expenditures of janitors to committees.

Mr. HAMLIN. No. The gentleman is entirely wrong. I am only defending in a friendly way the barbers, so called, in the Capitol Building. I am not defending those over in the House Office Building who do no janitor work, as I understand. I only say that the small committees that I though the gentleman from Massachusetts was referring to did not each have a janitor.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS], these janitors' salaries have been fixed by formal resolution of the House. If there is any desire to reorganize the janitor service to committees, it should be by resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if he will now indicate in this bill under which item the barbers in the House Office Building are carried?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are carried under the provision providing for "7 at $600 each," in line 6. Two of those seven are those employed in the House Office Building.

Mr. WALSH. But there are three over there on the rolls, are there not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Only two on the rolls, and those two who are on the rolls, I will say to the gentleman, are charged with the duty of looking after the gallery corridors of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Do they look after all the corridors around here?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gallery corridors; yes.

Mr. WALSH. I move to amend by striking out the word "seven," in line 6, and inserting the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 17, by striking out the word "seven," in line 6, and inserting the word "five."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. I want to ask a question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. Do I understand the gentleman correctly to say that there are four barbers in the House Office Building, two of whom are on the rolls drawing $50 a month?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not state the number from my own knowledge, because I have never been in the House Office Building barber shop; but I know that only two there are carried on the rolls.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There is a distinction made between those.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is because those who are on the rolls are required to perform service here in looking after the galleries in the building, an arrangement that has obtained for many years.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Do they perform any service over here in the corridors?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They do. They are charged with the duty of looking after and keeping clean the gallery corridors surrounding the House.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How did the others come to be there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are barbers. They are not carried on the rolls and do not receive anything from the Government.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think it right—I am simply asking for information—does the gentleman think there should be two on the rolls and two off?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is very good reason for it, because those on the rolls are required to perform services which are necessary and which are entitled to compensation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. On its face that appears to be a distinction; but I will say to the gentleman that I do not think the service they perform outside of the barber shop amounts to anything.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Some one has to look after the gallery corridors.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It looks to me as though it were a situation where two of the four are getting something that the other two are not getting. That is all. If they are, they should not do it.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer one other question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. How did the other two secure their places in the House Office Building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They secured them by permit.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it true that they are barbers and that the permit came from the ones that have charge of the House Office Building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That building, as the gentleman knows, is in charge of a commission.

Mr. DOWELL. And the commission grants this privilege to the two extra ones?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know whether they receive their permits from the commission or from the superintendent who acts for the commission, or whether they receive their permits from the Doorkeeper.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the Doorkeeper have charge of that room in the House Office Building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think not.

Mr. DOWELL. Then, there would be no reason for his giving a permit for that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I take it that the permit was granted because the additional men were needed. They are not on the pay roll. They serve the convenience of Members who go in there for a shave or a hair cut.

Mr. DOWELL. Would it not be possible to secure the services of two barbers in the same way?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That would be so if they were not needed for a distinct purpose, and that is to look after the gallery corridors.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman know that they perform this duty in the Capitol?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman have knowledge that these two barbers perform the service in the Capitol Building as janitors?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. In addition to that, when Congress adjourns for recess those men are required to stay here and continue to serve through the year as laborers, whereas those who are not on the rolls, of course, are free to go and secure employment elsewhere.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I might state there that the two men to whom reference has been made during the session pay the men to do this work here. They employ those men; so I was told by those men over in the House Office Building. When Congress is not in session those who were employed are discharged, and the others have to do this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: For clerk hire for Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, necessary in the discharge of their official and representative duties, $2,000 each per annum, $880,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners from and after July 1, 1918, shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House of Representatives and shall be paid in the same manner as other employees of the House are paid: Provided further, That each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner may appoint for such periods and at such rates of compensation as he shall determine within the said sum of $2,000 a clerk or clerks who shall be subject to be removed at the will of the person by whom they are appointed, but no Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner shall authorize an expenditure from the said sum of $2,000 proportionately greater for any period of the fiscal year than that portion of the fiscal year bears to the entire fiscal year: Provided further, That Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be entitled, from the date of commencement of their respective terms, to make appointments and removals of clerks under this application: Provided further, That the employment of any clerk or clerks hereunder shall cease upon the death, resignation, removal, or termination of service of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they were appointed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the paragraph, and I make the point of order to all that part of the paragraph beginning with the word "Provided," in line 3, and ending with the word "appointed," in line 2, page 21.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am making a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee reserves a point of order on the entire paragraph?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I reserve a point of order on the entire paragraph, and I am making now a point of order against all that part of the paragraph after the word "Provided," in line 3, on the ground that it is new law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman in charge of the bill desire to say anything about the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will say, for the information of the House, that in the colloquy which ensued the other day, when I was undertaking to present this bill, I made the statement that the amendment proposed was so drawn as to provide for elasticity in the payment of this fund for clerical help. In other words, that if the amount was not consumed in one month it would be subject to the disposal of the Member for clerk hire in any succeeding month. A great many expressed themselves as in doubt and some to the effect that they thought the amendment did not so provide.

Now, in order to remove any ambiguity it was my purpose, if the point of order had not been made, to offer the following amendment: On page 20, in lines 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, strike out, ", but no Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner shall authorize an expenditure from the said sum of $2,000 proportionately greater for any period of the fiscal year than that portion of the fiscal year bears to the entire fiscal year" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided further, That any accrued amounts remaining unexpended at any time during the fiscal year shall accumulate and be available for expenditure at any time during the remainder of the fiscal year.

I hoped that the point of order would not be made against this section, in order that I might offer that amendment, and I bring this to the attention of the House now so that those who may be proceeding upon the idea that the amendment was not drawn as it was intended may understand that it is the purpose to correct it.

Of course, I concede that the whole provision is subject to a point of order, but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], in the point of order that he has made as to a portion of the paragraph, seeks to cut out from this section a provision which has been carried for a number of years. That is the provision that Members shall report to the Clerk of the House the names of those whom they have appointed as their clerks or secretaries. I am frank to say to you that unless the gentleman proposes to leave that provision in, then I shall make a point of order against the remaining part of this paragraph, because I do not think that the House ought now to undertake to cut out that particular provision.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will state to my colleague that in the event that the point of order is sustained it is my purpose then to offer as a substitute for the language which will remain in the paragraph the current law, which does carry the provision that the names shall be placed upon the rolls as the gentleman has stated.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In the exact language?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In the exact language of the current law, with an addition to it which will make it permanent law.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman, under the circumstances, why not strike out the whole provision and offer it as one amendment? I mean why not make your point of order against the whole provision and then offer the amendment?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I should have no objection to that, provided we can be sure that the provision can be voted upon. Of course, the proposition is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say frankly to the gentleman that, so far as I am concerned, I would not be disposed to make a point of order against an amendment carrying the law as now carried.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, pending the decision of the point of order, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, may be read for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee as a substitute for the entire paragraph:

"Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for clerk hire, necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $2,000 per annum, in monthly installments, $880,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be entitled to payment under this appropriation: Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House and be subject to be removed at the will of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they are appointed; and any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may appoint one or more clerks, who shall be placed on the roll as the clerk of such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner making such appointments: Provided further, That said amount of $2,000 shall be the annual allowance for clerk hire for each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner hereafter to be paid under the limitations and upon the conditions herein prescribed."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is not offered now. It is read simply for information.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Simply for information. Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged for a moment, I will state to my esteemed colleague from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that the particular thing in the paragraph as drawn, to which I object, is the first proviso, beginning in line 3 and ending in line 8. The reason I object to that is that it would change the system of payments. Ever since the passage of the resolution of March 3, 1893, which was the beginning of the allowance of clerk hire to Members, in so far as I have been able to find from a hasty examination of the statute, the payment has been made to the Member direct, and he, of course, has been at liberty to make his contracts with one or with any number of persons to render the clerical service required. That system has been satisfactory. It has been a system which has enabled the Member to proceed with least trouble in securing the clerical assistance necessary.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. DYER. Can the gentleman inform the House if he knows the occasion which caused the Committee on Appropriations to report this other provision to which the gentleman has made the point of order?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean the one to which I am objecting?

Mr. DYER. Yes; the one to which the gentleman has made the point of order. Why has the Committee on Appropriations seen fit to offer that provision?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I assume that the Committee on Appropriations offered it because they thought it was right.

Mr. DYER. There is no doubt about that, but they ought to be able to give to the House some justification for offering it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman had been on the floor last Saturday, probably he would have heard the attempt I made to give some of the reasons.

Mr. DYER. I heard the gentleman's very able speech.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I wish to say this, Mr. Chairman, if I may be further indulged: Last year another legislative body somewhere in the United States essayed to become the guardian of the payment of clerical hire to Members of the House and put into a bill the identical provision to which I am objecting in this bill, and in violation of all the rules of that body the Members of that body were permited upon the floor of that body to cast aspersions, not upon individual Members of this House but upon the House as a whole. When the opportunity came this House, without emulating that other distinguished body by violating the rules of the House, gave vent to its indignation concerning it. The proposition was stricken from the bill, and the system which had been in vogue from the beginning of the allowance of clerk hire was permit ed to prevail, and was continued as the deliberate choice of this House of Representatives. The Committee on Appropriations now, for reasons satisfactory to them—I am not criticizing that committee—have brought in that very provision to which this House objected and which it insisted should go out of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not the gentleman think that his intimated criticism of the Appropriations Committee is hardly justified in that connection? Does not the gentleman think that the reason why the House perhaps so overwhelmingly resented the action of another body somewhere in the United States was due to the fact that they felt that they were able to take care of their own business?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. HAMLIN. I am decidedly in favor of the provision, and yet I resented what another legislative body in the United States did last year.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; I will say to the gentleman, since he has asked the question, I do not think that was the only reason. I think the reason why this body resented it, and the reason why there may be some feeling now concerning this provision brought in by the committee, is that it carries with it the implication that the Members of this House can not be trusted to administer $2,000 per annum clerk hire as honest men. [Applause.] That, in my opinion, is the reason that Members resented it.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Could not the Members of the House, on the same argument and for the same reason, be intrusted with the pay of the other employees of the House? Is it any reflection on Members of the House that the employees are put on the pay roll?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish my secretary to become known as an employee of the House. I want my secretary to be my secretary. [Applause.] The employees of the House render service to the House, and the secretary to a Member renders service to the Member—officially, it is true; but service peculiar to the Member—and there is a very confidential relationship existing between the Member and his secretary. Many Members have entered into contracts. Members have different methods by which they have the service done. In my own case, if gentlemen will pardon me for mentioning it, my office in Washington remains open the year round. The secretary remains in that office the year round, except what little vacation may be taken for rest. While I am at home, therefore, I employ stenographic assistance there—perhaps this person to-day and that person to-morrow and another the next day. That is the plan which I have adopted. Other Members have different plans. Contracts have been entered into. The existing law is satisfactory, and it seems to me that the existing law should prevail; and it seems to me that it should be made permanent, because it is not now permanent law.

Now, I want to state—and I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will pardon me, but I happen to know that he personally has, ever since the beginning of his service, like many of the rest of us, paid out much more than he receives for clerical hire—the reason I made the point of order on this proposition was in order to be absolutely sure that that provision would go out of the bill. For that reason I made the point of order to that part and reserved a point of order to the remainder, in order that after this goes out on the point of order I can offer that which I have had read at the desk.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my friend from Tennessee that the same purpose which the gentleman seeks to accomplish can be secured by striking the whole paragraph out and offering his amendment. I am frank to say that if the gentleman makes the point of order to the portion he indicates I shall make the point of order to the whole paragraph. The gentleman may then offer his amendment, to which as a whole I will not interpose a point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am leaving enough in there to offer a substitute.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand; but I shall feel constrained, if the gentleman makes the point of order to a portion, to make a point of order to all of it so that the gentleman can offer his amendment; and, so far as I am concerned, I do not intend, and have no idea of, making a point of order against any amendment which seeks to carry the existing law. But I do object, I will say to the gentleman in all frankness, to that portion of the gentleman's amendment which seeks to make this permanent law. I am opposed to making it permanent law unless we place these clerks on the roll. [Applause.]

This is not a case for feeling; it is simply a proposition of whether a Member believes that they ought or ought not to be on the roll. For my part, I believe that they ought to be placed on the roll. The gentleman says that he wants his secretary to be his secretary and not an employee of the House. I submit that the secretaries of the Senators are paid from the roll. They are on the roll, receiving their pay out of the Treasury, just as, I think, our clerks ought to be paid out of the Treasury. Nobody has ever questioned the fact that a Senator has absolute authority over those who perform clerical services in his office.

Now, there is another thing which I wish to call to the attention of gentlemen of the House, and that is the fact that you are doing an injustice to the employee who performs the clerical service to a Member of the House, as compared to those who perform clerical services for the Members of the Senate. Why do I say that? Because if, as you expect to do before this bill is concluded, you adopt a general increase of salary applying to those who are on the pay rolls of the Government, that increase will apply to the clerical help of those in the other body who, as we all know, are paid vastly more for services they render than are paid to those rendering similar and equally important service to Members of this House, and will not apply to Members' clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hardly think I am violating any confidence of the committee when I state that it has been considered that the limitation to which the increase of salary will apply is $2,000. The clerks to another body are mostly paid above that sum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say that as far as I am concerned there has been no limit as a maximum, and even if the committee had determined upon it I do not know what the House will do. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin is anticipating when he says it will come in with a limitation of $2,000. It may be more and it may be less. I simply threw that in by way of suggestion, as an injustice you are about to do to your own clerks. For my part I believe that the clerks ought to be placed on the roll, and certainly there is no Member of this House, not one, who is further from making the suggestion or implication that Members of the House are acting improperly, as was suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, might be the conclusion drawn if this provision is adopted.

What are you doing in this bill? You place limitations upon your Cabinet officials. There is a small sum of $30,000 carried in the bill for legislative reference, and this bill places a limitation upon the Librarian as to the manner in which he shall expend it and as to the amount of salary that he may pay under that appropriation. Does the librarian think that that is an implication in respect to his honesty of purpose? Is there any Member of this House who votes for it with the idea that the librarian would act improperly if we would leave that fund to him without the limitation upon it? You can go through this bill from one end to the other and you will find many, many limitations placed upon Cabinet officials. Is that an implication or an insinuation against them as to the manner in which they would act if left free? Certainly not. Then why should Members who oppose this provision choose to construe it as an implication against them? Then why should Members who oppose this provision choose to regard it as an implication against themselves? There is not an appropriation bill that is passed by the House that does not carry some sort of limitation upon it, limiting those who have charge of the expenditure, and yet this is the first time that it has ever been suggested that a limitation of this kind serves as an imputation of dishonesty upon those having charge of its administration.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman realize the difference between the House and the Senate in this particular? In the Senate each committee is provided with a clerk, an assistant clerk, and a messenger, so that the chairman of each Senate committee has three clerks, practically, and this bill carries a provision that each Senator who is not the chairman of a committee shall have a clerk, an assistant clerk, and a messenger, whereas by this requirement you practically make it imperative that a House Member have only one clerk?

A Member is not at liberty to split up and divide his allowance—oh, theoretically he can, but practically he is limited to paying it to one person and must go into his own pocket for anything paid to additional assistants. There is a difference between the Senate and the House in that respect. Each Senator has at least three persons in his office to help him, whereas a Member of the House has but one. He needs two.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman in the first place that there is no limitation upon any Member in respect to the number of clerks he may employ out of the $2,000 allowed for clerical hire, and if the gentleman had listened to the amendment I proposed to offer a moment ago——

Mr. TILSON. I heard it read.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He would understand that if the House is willing to adopt it it will provide that a Member may expend the $2,000 just as he pleases during the fiscal year, the only difference being that he puts his secretary or secretaries upon the pay roll. The people of this country do not object to giving to the Members of the House every particle of clerical assistance that they need for the prompt and efficient administration of their duties here. The people of the country want the membership of the House to have sufficient clerical assistance.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman not know that Members of this House have not sufficient clerical help? Does he not know that their work is greatly hampered for lack of clerical assistance, especially since the war began. That is the fact so far as the membership of the House is concerned, and the people of this country who know anything about the duties of a Member of Congress know it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I want to say this, in continuance of what I started to say, that they do not object to it, but

I do believe that before this House undertakes to increase its appropriation for clerical help it ought to place the secretaries upon the pay roll. That was one reason why a year ago I voted against the increase that was given at that time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Connecticut has called attention to the fact that Members of the House did not have sufficient clerical assistance. Is the gentleman aware that there are 17 or 18 committees of the House whose clerks are also the secretaries of the Members?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There are about 60 committees in the House, I think.

Mr. WALSH. But there are 17 or 18 of those whose clerk is also the secretary of the Member. They have time enough to act as clerk of the committee.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does not the gentleman realize that since this war began the clerical work of the Congressman has doubled to what it was?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know that is largely true, and I know, as a matter of fact, as my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] stated, that there are very many Members of this House, possibly all of them so far as I know, who have to pay out much more money than they get for clerical assistance.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman that I am compelled to employ not only my secretary but two others, the work has increased to such an extent, and it is desired to split this matter up. You can not afford to pay it all out of your own pocket. All of us pay out a large sum as it is. The exigencies of this war, it seems to me, demand that this ought not to be interfered with at this time, at least until we can get other help.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not see how the exigency of the war has anything to do with the question of whether or not those who are employed to render clerical assistance to Members shall be paid for their services directly by the Government.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is almost impossible to get stenographers. If you get one, you will have her for only two or three weeks, and then she goes into the Government service, and you are changing almost monthly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope if the gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that he will make it to the entire paragraph.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to that part that I indicated. I reserve the point of order as to the whole.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee is directed to all the matter beginning on line 24 with the word "provided," page 20, and continuing down to and including the word "appointed," in line 2 on page 21.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands it, the basic law in this matter is simply a provision of law that a definite amount may be appropriated for clerk hire for the Members of the House.

The fact that matter subject to a point of order is carried from year to year in an appropriation bill gives it no status against a point of order when it is raised. The fact that it goes over from time to time without objection does not prevent the objection being proper to be made and one to be sustained when it actually is made. Now, the gentleman from Tennessee directs, as I have said, his point of order to all the matter included within the limits stated. All of that matter is legislation, and very plainly it is all out of order, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against the remaining language, and I want to say in explanation of what I intend to do that I shall make the point of order against the remaining language in view of the fact that the gentleman from Tennessee has said that it is his purpose to offer an amendment which will take care of the clerical help. There will therefore be no danger of Members being deprived of the clerical assistance they are now receiving.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry? Would the gentleman be willing to submit that matter to a vote of the membership?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman and other Members of the House will submit to the House the proposition to place secretaries upon the roll I will gladly do so, and that is what I want.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that has been voted on here ever since I have been a Member.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it has not.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman does not need to beg my pardon; I have been here and I know.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will gladly submit to a vote if the gentleman and other Members permit.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have no objection to it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If I understand the gentleman from Tennessee, he states that if the House be permitted to have a vote upon the proposition involved in his bill placing them upon the roll that he then will not make the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; if we can have a vote in the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Not in the Committee of the Whole House. The gentleman will insist upon a vote in the House?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have no objection if we can arrange a parliamentary way of getting at it, but I do not see exactly how to get at it in a parliamentary way.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can tell the gentleman how to get at it, although the gentleman is a better parliamentarian than I am. If the gentleman will not make the point of order on this paragraph as reported by the committee and will propose in addition thereto the language he wishes to insert in lieu of that portion of this amendment reported by the committee to which he offers objection, it will afford opportunity in the House to get a roll call.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would not this be satisfactory to the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will say if the gentleman does not make the point of order I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let us see if we can arrive at some conclusion on this. I will say this: I do not know whether Members have investigated the matter or not, but if I may be permitted a minute, it does seem to me, let me say, that there ought to be some means devised by which this annual recurring trouble over this clerical hire could be dispensed with.

Mr. DOWELL. Put them on the roll and that will settle it. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That might settle it to the satisfaction of the gentleman, but it does not settle it to the satisfaction of a great many other gentlemen. They are on the roll now, I will say to the gentleman, under the law. A Member is required to make profert of those whom he appoints regularly as clerical help. I am not objecting to that. What I am objecting to is the change in the system of payments.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. It was suggested that we put them on the roll and do away with the annual controversy. I say if we put them on the roll it will just result in adding one new clerk every year until they get so many clerks, because you are not required to pay them out of what you receive, that there will be a scandal about it. That is the situation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In all probability that would be the result. What I was about to say was this: I am extremely anxious that if possible we may in some way get away from this annual worry and embarrassment concerning this question, and if we can arrange a way whereby the gentleman from Tennessee can have a vote upon the proposition I am willing myself to withdraw my point of order and offer a substitute for the proposition. If it then be adopted, the gentleman from Tennessee can demand a separate vote in the House upon that and have a roll call. Will that be satisfactory to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have just indicated my desire to perfect the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I should be willing if we can have an agreement whereby I withdraw the point of order, the gentleman offers the amendment to perfect in the way he desires, and then I offer my proposition as a substitute, and if it be adopted in committee then the gentleman can have a roll call in the House by demanding a separate vote.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will permit, I for one take exception to the language the committee has used in framing this paragraph, and if the gentleman does not make the point of order I shall.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What particular language?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I object to nearly all the language and the imputations in the language. It may not be——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, under these circumstances——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman has talked for half an hour, and will he permit some one else to talk for a minute? If the gentleman can frame language that will not be an insult and will accomplish what he wants. I will not make the point of order. But the language as it stands——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman takes exception to the language. I fail to see anything in the language that carries the slightest imputation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I see it and others see it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is in the habit of offering amendments. What would the gentleman offer?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is sufficiently able to take care of himself. It is easy enough to draw language that does not contain any imputation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I insist on my point of order, Mr. Chairman, to removing part of the paragraph so that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] can offer his amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first dispose of the point of order. The point of order is made to the remainder of the paragraph. I presume it is on the ground that the salaries contained in the remaining language are in excess of that afforded by the basic law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition for the submission of an amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the sustaining of the point of order now wipe out the appropriation itself?

The CHAIRMAN. In its present form. It is perfectly competent to offer an amendment in conformity with the basic law. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, after line 23, insert:
"To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for clerk hire, necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $2,000 per annum in monthly installments, $860,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I grant that to the extent of the salary that is stated, $2,000, it is subject to a point of order. Other than that I contend it is not subject to the point of order, because prior law has authorized the employment of clerks to Members of the House. The basic law is at present $1,200 for our clerk hire. If the chairman of the committee wishes, in view of the action taken by this body last year, to make the point of order to the amount that the Members of the House should use for the employment of clerk hire, it is his privilege to do so. I perform my duty in offering this amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that. If the gentleman will offer the current law, I will not do it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin, the Chair understands, has an amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does that rule apply? I know the gentleman has the right to the floor, but can he keep the floor indefinitely?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not going to let any one Member keep the floor for an indefinite time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD offers the following amendment: Insert the following:
"Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties, $2,000 per annum, in monthly installments, $880,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be entitled to payment under this appropriation: Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees ot the House and be subject to be removed at the will of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they are appointed; and any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may appoint one or more clerks, who shall be placed on the roll as the clerk of such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner making such appointments."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which has just been read by the Clerk is the language in the existing law that was incorporated in the bill last year. It makes no change whatsoever, and does not make it permanent law, but merely carries for the next fiscal year the same appropriation under the same conditions as the existing appropriation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not that go further than existing law in this, that it requires the Member to register the names of all persons employed by him to assist in his office? What I want to avoid is the necessity of reporting to somebody the name of every person employed by a Member to conduct his clerical work, his seed distribution, and similar matters—per diem employees. I passed the office of one Member yesterday who had no less than 11 persons employed addressing material. They were evidently on a per diem pay roll and at his own expense, because his secretary needed the help.

A Member of the House ought to have jurisdiction over this $2,000. I am perfectly willing to have the name of the secretary reported to somebody if the conscience of the House thinks that is necessary to meet public criticism. But the idea of being accountable to somebody for every person that may be employed throughout the year on various jobs which come under the designation of clerk hire seems to me supremely ridiculous in the first place and a direct reflection upon the integrity of the Member in the other.

Documents have to be sent out, as the gentleman knows; seed have to be sent out—few secretaries do that single handed—and there are some Members who have to employ from one to three and four assistants; some of them regularly. Does not the gentleman's amendment require that each Member shall keep an account of all money spent in this way—enter it up and report it here to somebody? That, I think, is an unnecessary requirement.

Mr. STAFFORD. The fear of the gentleman in making an accounting is not involved in the amendment here proposed. This amendment is existing law, and under it Members are required merely to report to the Clerk of the House the names of the clerks who are the recipients of this fund. The construction of this statute does not place any undue hardship upon the Members in the payment of the fund to the respective employees whom they require for their clerical service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask for two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I attempted to offer an amendment whereby the amount should be $2,000 per annum, payable in monthly installments without any restriction whatsoever. My purpose was that Members would be certain to secure $2,000, and not be deprived of that amount for their use during the next fiscal year. The Chairman of the subcommittee having this bill in charge made a point of order to that and stated he would not make the point of order to the existing law, and I am offering the existing law so that we all may continue during the next fiscal year under the same terms and practice as in the past.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do I understand that the amendment offered by the gentleman is the existing law?

Mr. STAFFORD. Exactly, word for word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And does not necessitate the detailed accounting to which I referred?

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. If I have time.

Mr. DYER. I would like to ask the gentleman as a member of the committee if he can say, representing the judgment of himself and the committee, if this matter is allowed to pass without a point of order, we will have no repetition of this unseemly performance in the next Congress and forever after?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can make no predictions as to the future.
Mr. DYER. I ask for one minute.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. DYER. I think the House is thoroughly sick of this unseemly performance. I hope this will be the end.
Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserved this point of order for a purpose. I do not know whether I can develop the purpose for which I really reserved it or not.
First, I desire most earnestly to say that I was in favor of the original language placed in the bill by the committee. I am utterly at a loss, utterly unable to read the English language, when I would undertake to read into the provision reported by the committee an aspersion on any Member of this House. Not a right is taken from him; not a privilege is taken from him. He can put on the roll whomsoever he pleases, and let his clerk get his own or her own money. He can put on more than one, if he wants to, and they can get their money.
It has happened to me more than once—and I dare say it has happened to many Members on the floor of the House in the same way—particularly during the campaign time, when I am absent from my home and my residence for two or three weeks at a time, campaigning in my district, that my secretary, who really needs her check, which may be lying in my office at the time at my home city, is unable to get her money until I return and indorse that check. Gentlemen seem to look upon that rather lightly. It may be that I am an exception to the rule. If I am, I am nevertheless stating exactly what has occurred to me on more than one occasion.
Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. COX. For a question.
Mr. REAVIS. I think that has occurred to every Member, who merely indorses the check and turns it over to his secretary.
Mr. COX. I take it, and I assume that every Member of this House indorses his check and turns it over to his private secretary. I hope that I am not exercising myself in a violent assumption when I thus make that statement.
Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. COX. Yes.
Mr. KEARNS. I will say to the gentleman that I never saw one of these checks in my life. My secretary signs my name to it and goes and gets it cashed.
Mr. COX. My secretary signs my name to a lot of letters, but I will not let my secretary, though I have undoubted confidence in her honesty, sign my name to a check. I will not let any mortal do that except my wife.
Mr. RUCKER. But it is the secretary's check.
Mr. COX. But I must indorse that before she can cash it.
Mr. KEARNS. It is her own money, is it not?
Mr. COX. Yes.
Mr. KEARNS. What is the difference, then, if she signs for it?
Mr. COX. There is a vast difference. I say, I assume that every Member of this House indorses the check and turns it over to the secretary. I assume, and have a right to assume, that every Member of this House has a private secretary somewhere, and that he is turning over every dollar of that money to the private secretary. Otherwise he is not entitled to the money. I am not here to cast aspersions on any Member of this House. I say, I assume that they do that; in fact, I think they do.
Now, then, gentlemen, this provision came up here last session and it was kicked out. The objection was that the Senate interfered with our prerogatives. That was the objection to it then. We first refused to accede to the Senate amendment, and then the leader on that side [Mr. MANN], moved to adhere to the House motion, and the House conferees, of course, finally yielded on that provision, because the House had to adhere.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. COX. Yes.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me ask the gentleman this: If that provision as it appears in the bill reported by the committee should become a law, then the clerk of the Member becomes a House employee. That is true, is it not, designated by the Member?
Mr. COX. Yes; technically true; but not her work.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Under the law as it now stands, there is allowed to the Member $2,000 for clerical hire. He can expend all of that for one clerk or he can expend all of that for half a dozen clerks, if he desires so to do, perfectly legitimately. Now, if you change the law and provide that the clerk shall go upon the roll and that the check for $2,000 per year shall be sent to that individual, then have you not prevented yourself from using any part of that $2,000 to pay any except one individual?
Mr. COX. No; the language under this bill is wide enough to permit you or any other Member of the House to appoint one or more than one upon the rolls here. I do not care whether you put one on at $1,200 and another one on at $800; let them go on the roll and let them draw their own money.
Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. COX. Yes; I will yield for a question.
Mr. KINCHELOE. If the gentleman feels that way about it and puts his secretary on the roll, and if some other Member of the House can manage his better in some other way, what kick has the gentleman got? [Applause.]
Mr. COX. I have no kick at all, except to kick this question out of Congress and keep it out of here. It will come back to plague us forever unless we put these people on the roll. It will come up every year when the legislative bill comes in; and there is just one way to prevent that.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?
Mr. KNUTSON. I object.
The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.
Mr. COX. It will come home to roost on you.
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I should like to know whether the gentleman from Indiana proposes to make the point of order?
Mr. COX. I can not announce that now. I want to propound a question to the House, as I said before, with a view to seeing whether or not there are any other amendments to be offered to this proposed amendment.
Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. GOOD. Has the point of order been disposed of?
The CHAIRMAN. It has not.
Mr. GOOD. Has a point of order been made?
The CHAIRMAN. It has not.
Mr. GOOD. Has it been withdrawn?
The CHAIRMAN. It has not. The point of order has been reserved. That is the status of this amendment.
Mr. GOOD. Then I ask for the regular order.
Mr. COX. I withdraw the point of order.
Mr. MOON. I reserve the point of order for a moment.
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee make the point of order?
Mr. MOON. No; I just reserve it for a moment. I want to say that I have no objection to the legislation that is desired, to put these clerks upon the rolls. But we have an illustration here to-day of the trouble we get into when a committee of this House attempts to usurp the power and authority of another committee. Under the law and the rules of this House the Committee on Appropriations has no authority to legislate about anything. It makes appropriations. Yet it is placing legislation upon its bills right along. There was no necessity for placing this legislation upon this bill. The committee might have made the appropriation as authorized by law. Of course no objection could be made before the bill came into the House and was reported, except to the whole bill, and that could not be done. The report having been made, then the committee got jurisdiction to bring the question before the House for consideration, provided it did not conflict with that other rule which is now being applied, of legislation on an appropriation bill. It is the insidious way in which they attempt to get in here that I object to. What condition have they put this House in to-day? The only law on this subject for the payment of secretaries is for $1,200 per annum. The increases have been carried in the annual appropriation bills. Now the amount is $2,000 a year. Any amendment above $1,200 is subject to the point of order.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will my colleague yield?
Mr. MOON. Yes.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman's statement as to the permanent law is not quite accurate.
Mr. MOON. Was it $1,500 instead of $1,200?
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; all the permanent law that I have been able to find upon the question is $100 per month during a session of Congress to those Members who are not chairmen of committees having clerks, and to those who are chairmen of committees having clerks, $100 a month during vacation.
Mr. MOON. I may be wrong as to the exact language of the law, but assuming that it is as my colleague says, it does not alter this situation one iota. Now what situation have they put us in in reference to this question? My colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], makes the point of order on the language following the appropriation of $880,000.

The point of order is well taken, because of the fact that it is legislation upon an appropriation bill. Then my other colleague from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] makes the point of order on the appropriation of $880,000, and that is well taken, because it is beyond the amount for which the committee could appropriate. In other words, the Committee on Appropriations comes into this House with new legislation that it ought not to have brought in, and then it comes in and of its own motion strikes from the bill the appropriation for the salaries of the clerks to the Members of the House and leaves the bill naked on that question.

Now, the amendment comes again from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. It is subject to a point of order. All these amendments are subject to points of order. You could not get anything into this bill now except the old salary under the old law if the point of order is insisted upon.

I mention these facts to show you the attitude that the House is put in by an attempt to usurp power that does not belong to the committee. The only thing that can be done legally, if this point is insisted upon, is to put back the old salary and then for the Judiciary Committee to bring into this House a bill that will authorize an increase of the salary to $2,000. The Committee on Appropriations has no power to do it, and it ought not to interfere with these questions. I am not going to attempt to further embarrass the House by making parliamentary suggestions. I simply reserved the point of order, not for the purpose of embarrassing the House in this matter and reducing the salary of these clerks, but to show you how wrong it is and what an error we can get into in an attempt to override the rules of the House and usurp a jurisdiction that does not belong to us. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to reply to the gentleman from Tennessee in kind, but the gentleman is chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I say in all good feeling that his committee has violated the rules of this House repeatedly. As we all know, it has been necessary for him frequently to go to the Committee on Rules to make in order propositions that he carried in the Post Office appropriation bill. They were placed there in clear violation of the rules of the House, as much so as any action of the appropriation committee about which the gentleman complains. I cite this to show the inconsistency of some complaints which are being made.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not yield now. The facts are these: The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has correctly said that the law now on the statute books provides only $100 a month for Members during the actual session, and $100 in vacation for those who are chairman of committees. Now, if the committee had brought in that sort of a proposition, it would have been a great injustice to you gentlemen who are not chairman of committees, with $5,000 for clerk hire by virtue of such chairmanship. This provision is primarily for the Member without a chairmanship, and not for the chairman of a big committee, who not only has possibly $5,000 for clerical help by reason of such chairmanship but also the help provided for each Member.

Long before I came to Congress the legislative appropriation bill carried a provision giving to clerks of the House a sum in excess of that provided by law. The Committee on Appropriations in this particular instance has done no more than Appropriation Committees have done for the last 20 years or more. The gentleman, my colleague, for whom I have great regard and great personal admiration, has been a Member of the House for 22 years, and yet this is the first time he ever rose on the floor of the House to criticize the Appropriation Committee because it has brought in a provision giving Members of the House adequate clerical service to enable them to perform their duties.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not equalize it by taking away some of the money from the chairmen of the great committees?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think that would meet with favor from them.

Mr. BUTLER. I belong to a party that is very unfortunate. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct in that; but so far as clerical assistance is concerned he is no more unfortunate than I am.

Mr. BUTLER. But I do not want you to reduce it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I did not desire to arouse bad temper in my friend from Nashville, nor did I rise for the purpose of making a statement that would in any way interfere with the salary given Members' clerks. His suggestion that a chairman of a committee could well afford, because he has other clerks, to let this go out on a point of order is not in accordance with the fact, because there is no desire on the part of any chairman of a committee that I know of to prevent the membership of this House from having $2,000 for their clerical assistance. I was just showing the attitude in which the gentleman can put the House and regretting that he did such a thing. With all kindness toward my good friend from Tennessee, he has put us in the attitude so that any man on the floor of the House, if he sees fit to do it, can object to these amendments and force this whole question to the Judiciary Committee for legislation in order for you to get over $1,200 a year for your clerks. I have not proposed to do it. I have said that I would not do it, because I did not want a thing of that sort done, and yet he gets up here and assumes that I have said that my purpose and intention was to do that, because I have some other clerical assistance.

Well, as far as I am concerned, I suppose our committee does about as much work as any of them, and I do about as much as any clerk. I do not want to put the House in an embarrassing situation at all. I wanted to emphasize the fact that this is an usurpation of power and authority which has to stop and is going to stop as far as I can help to stop it. If it was not for further embarrassing the House and doing an injustice, I would like to insist on the point of order and show the gentleman how necessary and how essential it is for committees to follow the law in this country instead of attempting to violate it by encroachment on the jurisdiction of other committees. The gentleman says that I have made no point of order against provisions heretofore. I have always made it a point in this House to look after the business of the committee that I had charge of and the work on that committee, if I could. I have not undertaken to interfere with other committees and do not propose to do it until they begin to encroach upon the committee that I am interested in. Then I am going to sustain the jurisdiction and dignity of that committee, if I can, and the gentleman will find before the consideration of this bill closes that it contains some other items that are going to be stricken out because of the assumption of jurisdiction that is not warranted. The Committee on Appropriations has to keep within its own boundaries, and if it goes into those of others it has to be driven out.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair indulge me by unanimous consent for just a word or two on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no point of order pending. The reservation of a point of order was withdrawn.

Mr. CANNON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Ever since I have been a Member of this House there has rarely been an appropriation bill, before the bills were divided or since they were divided, that has not had in it one or more and sometimes 15 or 20 propositions not provided for by permanent law. Every such proposition is subject to a point of order, and any one of the 435 Members can make the point of order. So, after all, I apprehend that with members of these respective appropriating committees it is a case of the pot calling the kettle black. If these outrages are committed it is within the power of any Member to trim the bill. It is said that it is responsible for all this hurrah about clerk hire. I think I understand why the hurrah. The law is $1,200 for each fiscal year during the session. There you are. That is legal. If this whole thing goes out on a point of order some one can offer the amendment for $1,200, and it will not be subject to a point of order, but there is not a man in the House now who does not understand that, and we have the language, because there is no Member that wants to cut down below $2,000; and there you are.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to perfect, and I submit that that takes preference.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] can offer an amendment to perfect the pending amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I offer as an amendment the following proviso, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee offers an amendment to the amendment of Mr. STAFFORD by adding at the end thereof the following proviso:

"Provided, further, That said amount of $2,000 shall be the annual allowance for clerk hire for each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner hereafter, to be paid under the limitations and upon the conditions herein prescribed."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the provision that makes it permanent law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to the point of order, and I suggest that it be disposed of.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the whole question, it seems to me, has been brought about by an attempt upon the part of the House to be economical. If this body would appropriate a sufficient amount of money to permit each Member to transact his business in an orderly way and with dispatch, there would be no question then but what we could put upon the rolls every one of the employees of such Members. The membership of this House is composed of men who are comparatively poor. A great many of the Members of this House can not afford to go into their pockets, as they are compelled to do every year, and hire clerks to transact the Government business. Let me call attention to what we have done already, without any objection at all. We have given to the other body an allowance for clerk hire. Take the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and I take it there is no more inactive committee in Congress than that.

Mr. MADDEN. That is in the Senate?

Mr. GOOD. That is in the Senate. On page 4 of the bill you will find that we appropriate for the chairman of that committee a clerk at $2,220 a year, an assistant clerk at $1,440 a year, a messenger at $1,200 a year. The chairman of that committee has a force to do his work that costs the Government every year $4,800. After we have taken care of all the Members of the Senate who are chairmen of committees—and there are 24 Senators who are not chairmen of committees—we incorporated this provision:

> For assistance to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, as follows: Twenty-four clerks, at $2,000 each; 24 assistant clerks, at $1,200 each; 24 messengers, at $1,200 each; in all, $105,600.

That amounts to $4,400 a year to every Member of that body who is not the chairman of a committee, so no Senator has less than $4,400 a year for clerk hire. The House has attempted to be economical. It has attempted to enact legislation that would permit a Member who can not afford to pay out of his pocket for clerical services necessary to perfrom his work to employ more than one clerk out of the allowance. Each Member of the House can put on the roll in the Clerk's office the names of the persons to whom he pays this $2,000, and he can pay it for such service just as he pleases during the year.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believe that the membership of this House is honest. I do not believe there is a man in the House who will take a single penny that is voted to him by Congress for clerk hire and use it for his own benefit. I have no objection to this amendment excepting this. I do not believe that now is the time, when our people are being taxed as they were never taxed before, to raise salaries, or to increase the expenses of the House or any department of the Government if it can be avoided. Adopt this resolution, and put on the rolls the secretary of the Member at $2,000, and the membership of this House will rise, as it will have a right to rise and ought to rise, and demand that each Member have an additional clerk in order that Members of the House can perform their work.

Now, I do not believe we ought to do that now. I do believe that we ought, if possible, to economize a little longer along this line. Advocating economy in other Government departments, let us set the example. This is not the time to change the law in this respect, for it will result in increased appropriations, and therefore I am for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I do.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman know of any time when a Member of Congress had more work to do and needed additional help any worse than he does at this time since this war has been in progress?

Mr. GOOD. No; I think that is true, and I think the consensus of opinion of the committee which has investigated this matter for years is that Members of Congress will get along by adding two and sometimes three employees as clerks and dividing up this $2,000, and thereby in a way perform their duties.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I do.

Mr. LITTLE. Is there any other branch of this Congress the Members of which have more work for their clerks to do than the Members of this branch?

Mr. GOOD. No; no other branch has as much to do, of course.

Mr. LITTLE. Excuse me, but how much less is the clerk hire of a Member of this House under this law than the clerk hire of Members of some other body?

Mr. GOOD. Twenty-four hundred dollars or more.

Mr. KNUTSON. Twenty-four hundred dollars.

Mr. LITTLE. Just put that answer in the RECORD.

Mr. GOOD. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, does the Chair care to hear from me? I invoke the well-known rule of parliamentary practice in this House that where a proposition which would as an original proposition be subject to a point of order is offered to an amendment or to a proposition which would have been subject to the point of order if made, that amendment or proposition is in order. The situation is this: The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] was subject to a point of order had that point of order been made, and the Chair would have sustained it, of course; but it not having been made, it having been admitted, then the amendment which I have offered, although as an original proposition it would have been subject to the point of order, is under the well-fixed rule in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Tennessee has correctly stated the status of this amendment, but the point which I desired to call to the Chair's attention was this: The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] had only reference to appropriations for this year. It did not attempt to enact permanent law that would control in the future appropriations under this item. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] offers an amendment, a part of which I concede is in order, but a part of which is not germane, in that it attempts to enact permanent law on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman means the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT?

Mr. GOOD. No; Mr. BYRNS. If I correctly heard the reading the amendment or the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] it provides that hereafter, and so forth.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That substitute has not been read, and it does not provide——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The amendment which I offered is to make it permanent law.

Mr. GOOD. This is the provision to which I desire to direct the attention of the Chair. It is that part which would enact this as a permanent law to which I object. I made no point of order on the other provision. It seems to me that portion is not germane to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The Chair will ask the indulgence of the committee for a few moments while he states the principles upon which his ruling will be based. These principles are often appealed to, and merit a very precise and definite statement in order that they may be clearly understood, and their application readily followed. If a paragraph contains any offending matter, and I mean by this any matter that is subject to a point of order, then the entire paragraph is subject to a point of order. It is competent, however, for a Member to direct his point of order to the offending matter alone, and if he thus restricts his objection, then the offending matter only, will be expunged. But if the point of order is directed to an entire paragraph, any portion of which is not in order, the point of order will be sustained as to the paragraph in its entirety. On the other hand a paragraph containing offending matter but not objected to on that account, remains in the bill as a whole, and within certain limitations, is open to amendment. The statement is often made that under the conditions last stated, the paragraph is open to amendments that would otherwise be out of order. But this is not a very precise statement of the rule since it is calculated to convey the erroneous idea that the door is wide open to amendments whatever their character, or the extent of their illegality. The true ruling and the one fully supported by the precedents is that a paragraph embodying legislation which is allowed to remain in an appropriation bill, may be perfected by a germane amendment, but this does not permit an amendment which adds additional legislation. Fourth Hinds, section 3836, ruling by Theodore Burton, Chairman. The Chairman, as a part of his ruling, made the following statement:

> The Chair, though somewhat doubtful, thinks the best rule is: That if a paragraph has been included in a bill which has in it a taint of illegality, or of being contrary to existing law, that paragraph can be corrected or perfected by an amendment: but if the further paragraph which is proposed, as an amendment, carries a further degree of illegality, affecting the whole paragraph as amended, then it is not in order.

Manifestly this ruling is fundamentally sound. The existence of illegality in a paragraph should not furnish the groundwork, or afford the excuse, to engraft upon the paragraph additional and perhaps more sweeping illegalities in the form possibly of radical changes of existing law. The principle fundamental to the whole situation is that it is undesirable to enact essential legislation in an appropriation bill. The distinction made by the Chairman in the decision cited, is clearly in the interest of good legislation, and wholesome procedure. It is one that was not only proper to be made upon the facts in that case, but one that ought to be followed, since otherwise, if some nonessential, but offending matter, should be allowed to remain in a paragraph, amendments of the most sweeping character, embodying new and additional illegalities might be construed to be in order, upon the theory that the presence of the offending matter in the paragraph under consideration, removed the right to object to new illegalities. Further rulings sustaining the position of Chairman Burton will be found in Fourth Hinds, section 3823, section 3826, section 3832, section 3838.

The conclusion of this matter then is that:

In an appropriation bill a paragraph embodying legislation and allowed to remain in the bill may be perfected by a germane amendment, that is, an amendment germane to this otherwise illegal matter, but this does not permit an amendment which adds additional legislation which is not a development, or perfecting of the original offending matter.

The amendment which the gentleman from Tennessee submits, proposes to add a new feature of permanent law to the proposition now under consideration. If there is illegal matter in the pending proposition, to what extent can the matter proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, be considered a development, or perfecting of that matter? It is an enlargement of the illegal content of the proposition before the committee, in the way of new and permanent legislation. The Chair does not consider that this amendment fairly comes within the principle announced with respect to perfecting offending matter allowed to remain in an appropriation bill, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CALDWELL to the Stafford amendment: After the word "appropriation" in the Stafford amendment, and before the word "Provided," insert: "And in addition thereto each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, who shall certify that additional help is necessary in the discharge of his official duties, one clerk, who shall be a stenographer, $100 per month during the session of Congress, to pay which so much as may be necessary is hereby appropriated."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Two gentleman reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Clerk to read the amendment as it will read if adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be read again for the information of the committee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I mean the entire amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 23, on page 19, insert: "Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: To pay each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner for clerk hire necessarily employed by him in the discharge of his official and representative duties $2,000 per annum, in monthly installments, $880,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be entitled to payment under this appropriation. And in addition thereto each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner who shall certify that additional help is necessary in the discharge of his official duties, one clerk, who shall be a stenographer, $100 per month during the session of Congress, to pay which so much as may be necessary is hereby appropriated: Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House and be subject to be removed at the will of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they are appointed; and any Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner may appoint one or more clerks, who shall be placed on the roll as the clerk of such Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner making such appointments."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make this point: This amendment is practically a statement of the law as it now stands, and if offered alone, without the Stafford amendment, would be in order. In addition to that, it is germane to the Stafford amendment, because it extends and perfects the proposition as submitted to this House in the matter of employment of necessary help in the discharge of the official duties of the Members, Delegates, and Commissioners in this House. This proposition was submitted to this House in the Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] was in the chair. The matter was there passed upon and the Chair ruled that it was in order, and the House voted upon it. And under that precedent, and under the precedents already established and read by the Chair here to-day, and in view of the fact that this is a germane amendment, is a repetition of the law as it now stands, and was ruled to be in order in connection with the identical amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] in the Sixty-fourth Congress, I submit this is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not restate the principles previously announced.

The Chair has been cited to the decision of Mr. Chairman HARRISON, and has examined it carefully, and also the other decisions on the principle involved. Mr. Chairman HARRISON seemed to consider that the amendment was in order on the general ground that the paragraph contained illegal matter, and therefore other illegal matter could be submitted by way of amendment. There was no precise statement of the principle, or citation of precedents. I have tried to point out the limitations which surround the admission of illegal matter to a paragraph already tainted with illegality.

The amendment provides an additional allowance for clerk hire for Members, and provides further that this additional allowance shall be expended for a stenographer. Looking to the proposition proposed to be amended, what is the illegal matter in that proposition which this amendment will develop, and perfect, and to which it may be fairly considered germane?

It would be difficult I think, to indicate this matter. The amendment is illegal in more than one respect. The paragraph, or amendment to which this amendment is offered, contains illegal matter, in that the amount allowed by basic law is increased from $1,200 to $2,000. Can it be fairly construed that an amendment which increases further that allowance, and provides in addition that this increase shall be expended upon a stenographer, merely perfects the illegal increase in the original allowance, without adding a new element of illegality, namely that the Members will be compelled to apply this increase to the employment of a stenographer? The amendment reduces the discretion of the Members in the application of the money appropriated for clerk hire. It directs their discretion, and requires it to be exercised in an accurately prescribed fashion.

It would be perfectly appropriate and in order to increase by amendment the amount of $2,000, and make it $3,000, if the committee chooses to do so, or $4,000, or any other amount that may be desired. Such amendments would be germane developments of the illegal matter. Should this be done, the Members could utilize the increase over the original allowance for the employment of a stenographer, since there is no limitation in the basic law upon the use of the money appropriated for clerk hire.

A Member may expend his allowance upon one, two, three or four clerks; they may be all stenographers; they may be clerks who are not stenographers; they may be typists; they may be both stenographers and typists. These details are left to the discretion of the Member when selecting his clerks. But this amendment takes away this discretion in the use of the increase proposed. It prescribes that the increased amount to be appropriated for clerk hire shall be expended upon the employment of a stenographer, and for no other purpose. Existing law leaves to the Members the free exercise of discretion in the application of the funds to be expended to secure clerical assistance. The amendment proposes new law. It creates an additional fund for clerk hire, a fund that can be expended in but one direction, namely the employment of a stenographer. This will be legislation on an appropriation bill, and new illegality. It is not a perfecting amendment to existing illegality, that is to say to what would be existing illegality if the increased appropriation for clerk hire had not been allowed to remain in the amendment without objection. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MEEKER. If an amendment had been offered to change the sum from $2,000 to $3,200, would that be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. According to the precedents, certainly.

Mr. MEEKER. I move that the Stafford amendment be amended to read "$3,200" instead of "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to amend the Stafford amendment by striking out the sum "$2,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the sum "$3,200." The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MEEKER. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 63.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to propound a parliamentary inquiry. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. If this addition should be adopted it becomes a part of the other amendment and would be reported to the House; and when reported to the House it would be subject to a yea-and-nay vote, as I understand it, and then how many of us will vote "yea"? If the vote is "nay" it cuts out everything.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee and Mr. MEEKER to act as tellers.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the process of voting. Those in favor of the amendment will pass through the tellers and be counted.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 83.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee offers the following substitute for the Stafford amendment:

"Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: For clerk hire for Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, necessary in the discharge of their official and representative duties, $2,000 each per annum, $880,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners from and after July 1, 1918, shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House of Representatives and shall be paid in the same manner as other employees of the House are paid: Provided further, That each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner may appoint for such periods and at such rates of compensation as he shall determine within the said sum of $2,000 a clerk or clerks who shall be subject to be removed at the will of the person by whom they are appointed: Provided further, That any accrued amounts remaining unexpended at any time during the fiscal year shall accumulate and be available for expenditure at any time during the remainder of the fiscal year: Provided further, That Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be entitled, from the date of commencement of their respective terms, to make appointments and removals of clerks under this appropriation: Provided further, That the employment of any clerk or clerks hereunder shall cease upon the death, resignation, removal, or termination of service of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they were appointed."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that the substitute is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Several gentlemen make a point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I direct the attention of the Chair to the language of the first proviso—

Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners from and after July 1 1918, shall be placed on the roll of the employees of the House of Representatives and shall be paid in the same manner as other employees of the House are paid.

Now, I invoke the two rulings of the Chair, just made, in support of the point of order which I now offer, namely, that it is not in order to offer a proposition not germane when it would add to the illegality of the original proposition.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And this proposition would radically change the existing law, in that it would change the method of payment to the clerk, and it would change the character of the clerk by designating him or her as an employee of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point of order comes too late; that this amendment has been considered, and that an amendment offered to it was voted down and disposed of therefore it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. This substitute was not offered to the House before, and as soon as it was offered the gentleman from Tennessee made a point of order to it.

Mr. WALSH. Is not this the substitute that was read to the House some little time ago?

The CHAIRMAN. For the purpose of information.

Mr. WALSH. Only for information?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I concede the fact that, in view of the ruling of the Chair, the amendment as read at the Clerk's desk is subject to a point of order, because under the terms of the amendment it would have the effect of making it permanent law. That was intended, because I believe we ought to have a permanent law on the subject if we can place these clerks on the roll. But in view of the point that has been made, if it is insisted on and in order to make the amendment, in my judgment, clearly in order, I want to ask unanimous consent that the words "from and after July 1, 1918," be stricken from the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I object to any modification in the way of amendment if there is any point of order pending. I am going to make the point of order on this myself, if nobody else does.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman objects. If the Chair is right in the ruling heretofore, this substitute amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I offer an amendment with the date "July 1, 1918," stricken out. I do not see that there is any necessity of reading it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "from and after July 1, 1918."

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment reported as it would read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment as it would read with the correction made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the amendment reported as it would read if it were added to the Stafford amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a substitute amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It has to be reported if anyone demands it. It is a new proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserved a point of order on the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee to the Stafford amendment:

"Clerk hire, Members and Delegates: For clerk hire for Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, necessary in the discharge of their official and representative duties, $2,000 each per annum, $880,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House of Representatives and shall be paid in the same manner as other employees of the House are paid: Provided further, That each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner may appoint for such periods and at such rates of compensation as he shall determine within the said sum of $2,000 a clerk or clerks who shall be subject to be removed at the will of the person by whom they are appointed: Provided further, That any accrued amount remaining unexpended at any time during the fiscal year shall accumulate and be available for expenditure at any time during the remainder of the fiscal year: Provided further, That Representatives and Delegates elect to Congress whose credentials in due form of law have been duly filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be entitled, from the date of commencement of their respective terms, to make appointments and removals of clerks under this appropriation: Provided further, That the employment of any clerk or clerks hereunder shall cease upon the death, resignation, removal, or termination of service of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they were appointed"

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the substitute is not in order; and I again direct the attention of the Chair to the language of the first proviso, which I quoted a few moments ago in making the point of order to the amendment as originally offered by the gentleman from Tennessee; that is, that it vitally changes the present law and therefore is not germane to the amendment, in that it changes the character of the clerk by making him or her an employee of the House instead of the employee of the Member, and that it changes the plan of payment by directing that the check be paid to the clerk instead of through the Member as heretofore.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment is germane to the amendment now pending. As I understand, that is the only question before the Chair.

The amendment does not make the clerk an employee of the House. The gentleman from Tennessee is mistaken about that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know whether it changes it or not, but it says that it does. It provides that the clerk "shall be paid in the same manner as other employees of the House."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The only thing it does is to change the method of payment. It says he shall be paid "in the same manner as other employees of the House are paid."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman what the word "other" means.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It reads "other employees of the House." The gentleman is right about that, but I submit that if this amendment is read from beginning to end it does not make the clerk an employee of the House, for it gives to the Member full and complete authority to appoint him, to discharge him, to give him any sum that he may please for any period of time that he employs him, and that being so he can not possibly be construed to be an employee of the House.

The only point I want to make is that this amendment is germane to the amendment pending, because it only seeks to change the method in which the clerk shall be paid. In one amendment it is provided that the amount appropriated for Members' clerks shall be paid to the Members themselves, whereas in the amendment which I have offered it provides that they shall be paid through the Clerk of the House.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It makes no change in the law. It makes no change in the number of clerks who may be employed.

Mr. MEEKER. Then why use the words "other employees," if this does not make the clerk an employee of the House?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I take it that is a distinction without a difference.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the existing law the clerks whom we employ are not employees of the House of Representatives and therefore they are subject to military duty. Under the phraseology of the substitute of the gentleman, would they not be employees of the House and relieved from military duty, so that a Member might employ a number of clerks and thereby exempt them from military duty because they are employees of the House, and as employees of the Congress they would, under the draft act, be relieved from military duty?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. By no means. I do not think this amendment can be construed as making these clerks employees of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read the language of the amendment, in order to get the precise facts before the House. The amendment contains this provision:

Provided, That all clerks to Members, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, shall be placed on the roll of employees of the House of Representatives, and shall be paid in the same manner as other employees of the House are paid.

The Chair is advised by the Clerk that that is the portion of the amendment to which the point of order is directed. It seems to the Chair that this language makes a very definite change in existing law. The basic law does not impose any requirement of this character in regard to the clerks of the Members, or require that they shall be paid as other employees of the House are paid. It is true that this change in existing law is for the duration only of this act, but the principle involved is the same. The Chair does not think that so large an increase of illegality as this amendment proposes, can be fairly said to be a perfecting amendment to the increase in the amount allowed by the basic law for clerk hire. If it could be fairly so construed, then this amendment would be in order.

The Chair is of opinion that this, like the other amendment, is controlled by the principle heretofore announced, and is not in order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But, as I understand, the Chair does not base his ruling on the fact that the word "other" is used in the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Not entirely.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the Stafford amendment by striking out the words "two thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "twenty-four hundred." At present Members are getting $166.66 per month for clerk hire. I think the amount should be $200 a month. After the amendment has been reported, then I would like to speak upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CALDWELL moves to amend the Stafford amendment by striking out the figures "$2,000," in the fourth line, and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,400."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would this remedy the difficulty the gentleman has in mind? The trouble is that when you fix the amount at $2,000 the clerk expects to get that amount. If you increase the amount to $2,400, the clerk will expect to get that. That bars the Member from employing additional help unless he pays for it out of his own pocket.

Mr. CALDWELL. In a great many instances that is true, but the trouble is that the chairmen of all of these committees, who have plenty of help, refuse to permit the other Members of the House to have the amount of help that they are entitled to, unless we write this bill in such a way as to meet with their approval. Now, personally I desire that enough money should be appropriated to enable us to pay for the necessary help to discharge our official duties.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman wants to get one or more clerks?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I want, and I presume most Members do.

Mr. CALDWELL. If this amendment is adopted, instead of "clerk hire" why not say "two clerks," so that a Member will have to divide it?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it ought to be thoroughly understood in what the gentleman is going to say that he intends the $2,400 shall be used to pay for such number of clerks as a Member may think proper to employ.

Mr. CALDWELL. Absolutely.

Mr. MADDEN. So that the secretary or the clerk of the Member will not feel that it is his as a matter of right and that the Member has no rights.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think the amendment should be further amended to provide for two clerks.

Mr. MADDEN. To employ all that a Member likes to employ.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Would the gentleman object to having the names of the clerks on the roll?

Mr. CALDWELL. No.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. COX. Would it not obviate the objection if the gentleman's amendment should carry, to put in a proviso providing that this shall not apply to chairmen of committees who have annual or session clerks?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, in the Sixty-fourth Congress I attempted to get additional help for Members who are not chairmen of committees. At that time I was paying out of my own pocket a sufficient sum of money to be considered as an item in my annual expenses. I found when I started this agitation that there were a great many Members of Congress who did not have chairmanships in exactly the position that I was in. I find that many men who voted against the proposition in the Sixty-fourth Congress, and are still here, admit that they made a mistake in not giving additional help to Members. Now, it happens that in this session of Congress we are in a war, and we have here in the course of the operation of that war a great deal of military legislation requiring the attention of Members of Congress. We are the only representatives of the families left at home who have boys gone away to the trenches and who need the assistance that the Government of the United States is prepared to give to those families left here dependent upon us. [Applause.]

Every day my mail is filled with complaints of mothers and sisters and of the children of the men that we sent away to France to defend our country that they are not receiving the appropriation that we have made for the support of these families. It is necessary for me to conduct a great deal more correspondence than I did before, and I know that I am not unique in that position, but that every other Member of the House is under the same obligation. I want to say that I have the courage and conviction to vote for the necessary appropriation to enable me to discharge my duties for which I was elected, and I hope that there are enough other Members in the House to back me up. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to detain the House on this amendment, but I express the earnest hope that the House will not adopt it. Here is a proposition, Mr. Chairman, that adds to the pay roll $176,000. I want to appeal to the Members of this House at this time, when we are heavily taxing the people in order to meet the enormous expenditure of this great war in which we are engaged, when no man can tell how much more taxes we will have to levy upon them before we bring this war to a successful conclusion—I say I want to appeal to the Members of this House not to increase the burden of the people by adding $176,000 to their present burdens for our own benefit in the way of payment to our clerks.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. How much additional work has the gentleman had this year over last year? I will answer that myself by saying that I have had very little.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have had some additional work growing out of the war.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not a fact that every year there is debate in this House as to the appropriation for clerk hire? Why should it not be written down who the clerks are?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I submit in all fairness that we can not afford to increase the clerk hire up to $2,400, especially since a year ago we raised it from $1,500 to $2,000. We ought not to do it in the interest of the taxpayers of this country, who are now overburdened, although they are willing to bear the burden and will bear others in order to win the war. I appeal to you to vote the amendment down.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. If this amendment is voted into the bill, when the bill gets into the House and a separate vote is demanded on the amendment, will the vote come on the amendment as a whole, and if the amendment is then voted down there will be no appropriation for clerk hire?

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Gentlemen of the committee, I offered a little while ago an amendment to make this $3,200, and I did it in good faith. I do not know what may be the obligations of other Members of the House. I think that it is just as well to be frank in regard to the expenses as to anything else. Since this war has been declared my office force has cost $325 a month. They work all the time, and there is no man who has a district that is a live district, if he is a live man, who can divide $2,000 among his clerks and look them squarely in the face when he does it.

We put anybody into the civil service at $75 a month, and ask people to work in our office for $50 and $60, and then we talk about good wages. Now, some gentlemen in this House are financially able not only to pay for all help in the office but to hand back their salary checks; but, thank God, there are not very many of that kind. [Applause.] There are some other Members in the House who are running for office in the district because of the cheap way in which they get along when they are here; but, thank God, there are not many of those. People in this country want service.

They want efficiency. The Senators now get on an average of $5,500 a year for clerk hire—almost $6,000. Everywhere else in all appropriations this year we have been giving money by the billions, for all of the departments, without a moment's hesitation; yet when it comes to the man who does the work, the man who stands between the people and the Government, the man who acts as the go-between for both, in all of the departments, we get up here and camouflage for two hours about a hundred dollars a month more in war time with which to serve the people. I venture to say there is not an efficient Congressman in this House who is within $1,000 of what he gets from his appropriation for this work now; that he is paying anywhere from $100 to $200 a month out of his own pocket. Some gentleman awhile ago wanted to know who would vote yea on the $3,200 proposition. I will do it, quickly. [Applause.] It is only honest, and when we stalk around talking to our people we can do one of three things: We can either neglect our work, or keep our office force at so low a pay that we are ashamed to tell how many we have and what we pay, or pay for them out of our own pockets. I do not think the people of this country expect or want that a man shall come here and do all the work that needs to be done and at the same time bear such a heavy portion of the burden financially; and it is only practical common sense that we should see to it that the office force should be kept up. You have go to do one of two things: If you attend to your departmental work yourself, you neglect the work on the floor of the House as a legislator; if you attend to the work here as a legislator, somebody has got to look after that departmental work.

The danger to the American Congress to-day is that the membership shall become mere departmental flunkeys for their district and forget the legislative end of it, the thing for which they were sent. We should have $5,000 a year to run our offices. We should be able to put men in those offices who are recognized as competent, efficient departmental men, who could give all of their time to the work of the details of all matters for the people back home, and the men on this floor should be given and should take more time to go over the legislative matters that are coming before us. The chairman of the committee appealed to us not to vote this $400 extra. All it would amount to would be $200 a month total. I have over 500,000 people in my district. Mail comes into my office at the rate of from 100 to 250 letters and telegrams a day since we have declared war. I can either throw all of that in the wastebasket or go out and pay for the extra help to attend it. There is nothing about this thing in any way but just an attempt so that a man can go back to his district and say that while he voted billions for everything else he kept his office down to a cheap line all of the time. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I have been on the Committee on Appropriations for several years. It is most difficult to understand the demands made upon the Public Treasury until you are brought face to face with the conditions every day as are the members of the Appropriations Committee. The present salary of Members' secretaries is ample. It was increased last year from $1,500 to $2,000 by the House over the protest of the Committee on Appropriations. Now, we see some Members voting to increase their clerk hire to $3,200. This was voted down a moment ago by a small majority. Now comes a proposition to increase the salary from $2,000 to $2,400. This can not be defended anywhere or at any time upon any ground of reason or fairness. These places were created to enable Members of Congress to attend to their official duties by being relieved of a great deal of office work. These places were not intended to be used to assist Members in their campaigns. Those Members who think that your campaign funds should be furnished by the Government should have voted for the $3,200 and should now vote for this $400 increase. My own opinion is that when a Congressman confines his clerical business to the business of his office, there is not a Congressman here who can not have all this character of legitimate business attended to, but if he expects to conduct a political campaign at the expense of the Government, and is a constant campaigner of his district and is a constant searcher out in the departments for something he may send out to make a vote, and if the Public Treasury shall respond to keep him in Congress, then say so by voting to increase the private employment of the Members of Congress to an unlimited extent.

Mr. BLAND and Mr. CALDWELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I have only five minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will get the gentleman some more time.

Mr. SISSON. Very well; I will yield if the gentleman will get me more time.

Mr. CALDWELL. I want to say to the gentleman that if he means that as a reflection upon me, I would like to know it right here.

Mr. SISSON. I have not intended any reflection upon anyone. I have only stated my own position and my own views on this question, and in so doing only assume responsibility for my own vote. I have simply stated the fact to be that if a man gets $2,000 for clerk hire and that clerk devotes all of his time and attention to the business of the Member as a Congressman, of a legitimate nature, not connected with matters which may help to reelect him, as a part of his campaign, that the American people are responding liberally, and I am trying to be honest at least with myself and say that my clerk is able to do that work and that his present compensation is ample.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SISSON. One moment. Not only that, but I want to say that if you had a dozen clerks, you gentlemen who want to do departmental work effectively would have to make frequent visits to the bureau chiefs and the departments to get your work done and be honest with yourself. For many things can better be done by the Congressman than by a clerk.

Several Members rose.

Mr. KEARNS. How many voters has the gentleman in his district?

Mr. SISSON. About 30,000 registered voters. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield to all of these gentlemen who are clamoring to interrupt me. I did not know that so many Members were so touchy.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The gentleman will discontinue until order is restored.

Mr. SISSON. I decline to yield at present.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I decline to yield at present. I had no idea that when I made that statement that it would touch so many people personally or that it would touch so many people who themselves have greedy eyes upon the Treasury. [Applause.] I had no idea that men's consciences were that tender about this matter which affects themselves and their own private offices, and when I made the statement a moment ago that I believe that a Member of Congress who retains to himself that proper amount of intellectual integrity so that he could confine his clerk hire, which last year was increased from $1,500 to $2,000, to the services that the clerk renders of that nature which devolves upon him only as a Congressman and not to help in his campaign [applause] that it would create such a storm among so many Members. Think more of the taxpayer and less of your own interest, and you will be better Congressmen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I would ask for five more minutes.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I object unless the gentleman yields to me.

Mr. SISSON. I will yield as much as I can, but I can not yield to 25 or 30 at a time when I only have five minutes.

Mr. BLAND. I only want the gentleman to yield to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, regular order!

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded, and the regular order is, Does anybody object to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, may I submit a request for unanimous consent? I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments be closed in 20 minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate upon the amendment and all amendments thereto terminate at the expiration of 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I promised to yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. I notice the suggestion that everything above $2,000 would be used practically for political purposes. I find that there is another body of people in this building who receive an average of $5,562 for clerk hire. What I wanted to ask was, Does the gentleman think the excess they draw above what we draw is used for political purposes?

Mr. SISSON. Well, in some instances it may be so used. I do not know; but a Senator from one of the States has just as many times more voting population to care for as there are congressional districts in the State than the Member from the district in this House, and——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would suggest that a Member of this body should not discuss the Members of another body.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think the gentleman from Kansas had infringed upon that rule because he did not mention the other body; but, as a matter of fact, two wrongs do not make a right. What I am endeavoring to leave with each man and each man's conscience is this, that in voting the people's money for your clerk hire do you say on your conscience that if you were to restrict your clerk to those proper duties which devolve upon you as a Congressman and not to do your campaign work, would you need the extra clerk hire?

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. Let me finish this sentence.

Mr. MEEKER. Is it not true that the total vote of the gentleman was 4,684 votes?

Mr. SISSON. In the general election; but we have no opposition after the nominations. [Laughter.] I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BLAND. I was going to ask about the same question.

Mr. DYER. How many white people and how many negroes are there in the gentleman's district?

Mr. SISSON. It is about equally divided between the whites and negroes.

I can not yield to all, and decline to yield further. I do not intend to permit the statements that have been made here to go unchallenged, that if the $2,000 is used for legitimate purposes, and, by the way, I do not say you do anything illegitimate in the sense that you violate the law; I mean if you will consult your intellectual integrity and act on your oath as officers of this House you do need that much. I doubt extremely whether many of you would answer in the affirmative and say, "Yes; I need more and want the taxpayers to pay more."

Mr. MEEKER and Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I can not yield to all. Too many of you seem to be hit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I demand order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I realize fully——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I demand order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I started to say I realize the difficulty in keeping many people out of the Federal Treasury, but I did not know that you would ever find such a grand rush upon the Treasury here from Members of Congress to get funds for their own use, because you and you only, together with the other body, are the sole guardians of the Treasury of the United States. Now, if you have made up your minds that notwithstanding the fact while this Government is being taxed white for war purposes and is called upon to respond in every line to the ever increasing demands made upon Congress, until the burdens are intolerable, that you will for your own offices demand this increase, you have the power to do it now. But mark you this, the day of reckoning will come, and may come soon, when the outraged people will right the wrong. Vote down this amendment. I ask you Members on the Republican side to join us on our side and vote this amendment down. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I desire to ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments close at the end of five minutes.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me state the unanimous-consent request first.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I move that all debate close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not move that now, because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has been recognized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will permit me to do it.

Mr. CANNON. If I can have the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the extent of the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments to this paragraph close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments to this paragraph will terminate at the expiration of five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the motion just made. I move to insert the word "fifteen" in place of "five," and ask that five minutes be given to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee accept the amendment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

The CHAIRMAN. How does the gentleman from Minnesota move to amend the motion?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. By adding the words "fifteen minutes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, this amendment is to increase the amount of clerk hire from $2,000 to $2,400.

Now, just let me call your attention to a little ancient history. In my first Congress, the Forty-third, the salary was $7,500, having been increased from $5,000 by the Forty-second Congress by a great majority just on the eve then of hard times. "Hell was to pay and no pitch hot." [Laughter.] Men that voted for that increase turned it back into the Treasury and were ridiculed, and that increase had more to do with giving you wicked Democrats three-fourths of the House than almost any other matter. People were out of humor, their taxes were high, and all that sort of thing.

Now, this war is on us and we have to win it no matter how long or short it may be. [Applause.] That is number one. Number two: We spoiled an hour or two this morning on $100 increase to a laborer. Number three: As the money decreases in value, and as everything else, as measured in dollars, goes up, it is wonderful how much we have got to increase wages where we ought to increase them, to Government employees, and all this, that, and the other. Our salary is $7,500, with clerk hire of $2,000. This is a proposition to increase the clerk hire by $400. I do not care whether I continue longer in public service or not—and this is from a personal standpoint—but as I look into your faces I think you all, on both sides of the House, want to bring your experience into the next Congress. How many of you are to have opponents I do not know, but if you increase the clerk hire $400 that will let the demagogue in. It lets the man in who is now outside, and if I was a strong partisan just at this time, and if I could get all the Democratic side of the House to vote for it, and all my side of the House to vote against it, we would knock you out.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask the gentleman to yield in order to say that if any demagogue in my district could beat me over an appropriation of $400 to assist us in our duties here, I hope he would be able to do it.

Mr. CANNON. I have only five minutes. Let me say that the gentleman may have a fortunate constituency. It is a bad time for us, with our $7,500 and $2,000 for clerk hire, with all the appeals that are made to us for legislation, to increase salaries, and make all kinds of expenditure. It is a bad time from every standpoint to increase our pay one cent. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the original amendment has not been adopted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For packing boxes, $4,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 21, strike out lines 13 and 14.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to make any speech on this amendment. I desire to state the effect of it. It is to strike out the appropriation for oak and cedar boxes that are ordinarily distributed to Members of Congress during the session. I do not wish to make any speech on it, but I do think that it is an item that might well be dispensed with. Therefore I move to strike it out.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will state that a similar provision to this was passed without objection for the Senate. This is for the benefit of the individual membership, and every Member will vote whether or not he has official need of these boxes. I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COX. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Congressional Reference Library: Custodian, $1,500; assistants—1 $1,200, 1 $960, 1 $840; 2 junior messengers, at $420 each; in all, $5,340.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FESS: Page 24, line 12, after the figures "$1,500" insert "and $500 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I would like to have close attention, if I can ask for such a thing in this House, to a few observations that I want to make very briefly.

This amendment is intended to add to the compensation of the present incumbent, the custodian of the Representatives' reading room over here in the Congressional Library, the sum of $500 so long as he holds the position. It is intended to add $500 to his annual salary, beginning this year.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Just in a moment. While I was in Ohio, before I became a Member of this body, I was considerably interested in library work, and my interest was stimulated in this custodian of the Representatives' reading room through one of Ohio's men most interested in library work.

The man who holds this position, Mr. Lawrence Washington, is the only living man to-day born in Mount Vernon. He was born in the room in which the general died. He is the great-great-grandson of John Augustine Washington, the brother of Gen. Washington, the Father of his Country, and thereby he makes a connection with the Government back to the founder of this Republic.

He has been in the Library for over 20 years. Some 20 years ago he collected and sorted out the British parliamentary papers, which have been bound and now form 900 volumes, a very valuable piece of work, especially valuable to anyone interested in political or parliamentary history, as it makes a treasury of original information. He also made a careful notation of all the missing documents in the set of United States documents, a mammoth work for anyone to undertake and a most valuable contribution for our convenience, because when undertaking to find how many volumes there were in that set—I suppose there are at least 10,000 volumes in it—one is simply amazed at the stupendous task carried out by this man who has gone through all of them and has pointed out the missing documents and, where it was possible, ascertained where they could be found, if they are available.

I say nothing about his very courteous attitude toward the public or his very scholarly attainments. I do not think it is worth while for me to say that, because his position would warrant our expectation of that character. But, speaking of him personally, I may say he has eight sons, five of whom have entered or will enter the war, and four daughters, a family that he has brought up and educated, which, to say nothing of such contribution to his country, proves the burdens undertaken by a citizen who to-day gets only $1,500 a year. I do not want to ask that the salary of that position be raised permanently, although I am sure it ought to be done, if salary is measured by standard of service, but so long as this man is holding that place he ought to be given an additional amount of money. I at first thought it ought to be $1,000 additional, making the salary $2,500. Some may think that figure is out of order. But it is not out of order. A man who can do the work he has done and is doing on behalf of Members of this body, and whose past service has saved to the Government the amount of money he has saved, because it would have cost the Government if it had been compelled to expend money to have this work done by experts, deserves this additional compensation. But aside from the amount of money saved, and aside from mere sentiment, and aside from his efficiency and cordiality and the valuable service he renders to this House, it seems to me he is worth an additional sum of money because of his devotion to the task he so cordially performs. It requires a familiar knowledge of books, a fairly good comprehension of subjects, and especially a facility to find what one is anxious to know. His service is valuable because to his knowledge is added an evident anxiety to render service. He must also be a man to deal with men of various temperaments. He has been especially valuable to Members who have occasion to look into documents and ascertain the sources of information. It is not important to know things but rather to know how to find what one does not know. This is the function of Mr. Washington.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. I think the House would very quickly respond to the gentleman's wishes if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will not interpose a point of order. If the gentleman from Tennessee will let the House vote on it, I think we will all agree with you.

Mr. FESS. I agree with you that the House will not hesitate a minute if we can get over the difficulty of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Just one moment more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Speaking for myself, as one who frequently makes investigations on subjects that we have up for discussion, it is my custom to telephone over to the Representatives' reading room and call for Mr. Washington and tell him that I want to come over by a certain time this evening and look up some particular line of research. I tell him what I want, and say, "Will you please have the documents on the table, so that I will have access to them?" I go over there; there the books are, an abundance of them. Not only are the books there, but not infrequently the subject has been looked into and places marked, whereby with the expenditure of a very short time and the expenditure of very little energy I can look through the books and ascertain the facts that I want. Now, you can not pay for that. That is cordiality, based upon ability, of course, which is valuable and rare, and it is a service that all of us ought not only to appreciate, but show our appreciation of; and in the interest of the man and his work, I hope that the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his point of order. I feel quite sure that those of you who have made frequent visits to the Library and know Mr. Washington must be as much surprised as I was to learn that the Government only paid him $1,500 per year. If for no other reason, it would appear sufficient that a man who serves the membership of this House intellectually, as he must, would be rated differently, and especially when so efficient and when his name and birth link him with Mount Vernon and with the Father of his Country. I hope the point of order will be withdrawn and the House be given a chance to vote on the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I would not undertake to add anything to what the gentleman from Ohio has just said, but I do hope that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will not make his point of order.

I do not believe in all the departments of this Government a man can be found whose work is more efficient than Mr. Washington's, and I do not believe that an employee can be found the efficiency of whose work is as far out of proportion to the compensation that he receives from the Government. He not only does the things that Dr. FESS has referred to, but does them efficiently and effectively and intelligently. There are few Members who in the course of their service do not call upon Dr. Washington for help, and they never call in vain. The assistance that he renders by reason of the universality of his information is worth many, many times to the Government the money that we pay him in salary. Think of it! Think of a man of his qualifications, a man who does the valuable work that he does and renders the efficient service to the Government that this man renders, receiving only $1,500 a year!

I am told he has been in that library 20 years. I know he was here when I came here 15 years ago. I have gone to him for assistance more than I have to any other one man in the Government, and I have never gone in vain. I have never asked him about any matter touching legislation here that he was not only willing and anxious to help me but also able to render most valuable assistance. Even if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] thinks it is a bad precedent to set in this bill, I hope the gentleman will realize the fact that this is certainly an exceptional case.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. What is his salary now?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Fifteen hundred dollars.

Mr. LONDON. And what is proposed in the amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Two thousand dollars.

Mr. LONDON. Five hundred dollars more?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Is not $1,500 rather small compensation for a man of the efficiency and ability that the gentleman has described?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I doubt if there is another man in the Government, certainly there are few as thoroughly equipped, who get so small a salary. No man will gainsay the fact that he is as thoroughly efficient and as thoroughly well equipped as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has indicated. I hope very much that the gentleman from Tennessee will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. HICKS. If the gentleman will allow me a couple of minutes, I wish to say that for the last 12 months I have had a good deal to do in the Library, in investigation and research, and I want to pay my tribute to Mr. Lawrence Washington, not only for his courtesy and politeness, but for his ability in intellectual pursuits, and I think we ought all to indorse heartily what has been said of him by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. I want to add my appeal also to the chairman of the committee that he will not raise the point of order against this.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would it not be a distinct loss to the Members and to the Library if his services were in any way impaired or we were unable to avail ourselves of the splendid services of this gentleman?

Mr. HICKS. In answer to my friend from Michigan, I will say I think it would not only be our loss, but a loss to the entire country, because he is doing work there which is a benefit to all our constituents.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not question for a moment the high tributes that have been paid to Dr. Washington by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS]. On the contrary, I am quite sure that all they have had to say concerning him is entirely true. In addition to that, there is a sentiment touching the name of Washington which appeals to every Member of this House. But the truth of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is several hundred dollars more than the amount estimated for. The matter was considered in subcommittee, and the majority of the committee decided to leave this salary at the present figure. The general committee, of course, met and authorized the reporting of the bill. Frequently a Member has some very unpleasant duties to perform, but I feel that under the circumstances I am constrained to make the point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Just a moment. Will the gentleman allow the Committee of the Whole here to express its judgment on this matter? Let us vote on it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that he knows that in the consideration of this bill there are many similar requests made, and, to be perfectly frank with the gentleman, I do not feel that I am authorized to waive the point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman remembers that we made an exception here in the matter of the salary of the Chaplain, and no point of order was raised, and the committee was permitted to vote on it. Now, that was a very exceptional case, and so is this. I hope the gentleman will not feel that his duty compels him to interpose this summary protest, by which the House will be denied the right to express its judgment

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FIELDS. In view of the fact that the House seems almost unanimously in favor of this increase, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think he could well afford to withhold his point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will look around I think he will see that there are not very many Members on the floor to express themselves one way or the other.

Mr. FIELDS. I think that if the attendance were larger the support to this amendment would increase equally.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, for the reasons stated I feel constrained to make the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for one moment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman said the amount named in the amendment was several hundred dollars higher than the estimate. What was the amount estimated?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The amount of the estimate was $1,600.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Would the gentleman make any objection to $1,600?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The same reasons would necessarily apply to that. As I stated, the committee considered this matter. It was not passed over lightly, and by a vote of the committee it was decided to let the salary stay at the present amount. Much as I have been moved by the very strong appeals made here on the floor, I do not feel that I have the authority to waive the point of order.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman think that a man who will raise nine children, five of whom are in the service of the United States in the Army——

Mr. FESS. Twelve children, eight sons and four daughters.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Twelve children, and who has given five splendid men to the military service of the United States, and who has worked for the Government for 20 years on $1,500 a year, ought to have a medal, the thanks of Congress, and a pension of at least $500 a year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think there is only one answer to that question.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. I think the gentleman from Tennessee has stated the matter fairly, that the committee did consider the question. It considered it, however, under the light that the committee had. As a member of the committee, I must confess that I have received some information that I did not have when the matter was before the committee; and I know that the gentleman from Tennessee now is in possession of facts that he did not have when the committee considered the question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that when the matter was first taken up I was lacking in some information that I now have, but the gentleman remembers that before the subcommittee finally acted on this matter all that information was brought to us.

Mr. GOOD. I do not recall that the size of the family of Mr. Washington and the number of men that he will send from his own family to fight our battles was stated before the committee.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when this bill goes to the other body, when it goes to any deliberative body, and they consider these facts they will not hesitate to give this man a salary that ought to have been received by him for the last 10 years. [Applause.] When I found that this man was receiving a salary of only $1,500 I was amazed. I did not know that he was the man that was performing the duties of custodian in that position. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order. I hope he will let the House to-day perform what is a simple act of justice to this Government official and let the House take the responsibility. I do not believe that the gentleman from Tennessee wants to take it. I know how he feels about it. I know the gentleman is fair at all times and wants to be generous, and he wants to do what is right in regard to these things. I am sure he would not intentionally deprive this man of the salary that he thought he was justly entitled to, though the express letter of the law gave him a lower salary. I hope he will let the Members of this House determine this question, because it is a most meritorious one.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. RUCKER. There are a good many increases in this bill, are there not?

Mr. GOOD. There are some as much as $500.

Mr. RUCKER. Some as much as $1,000?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. If one-half that gentlemen have said here is true, and I presume it is all true, I should like to know what sort of a mountain of testimony was presented to the chairman to induce him to raise the salary of a bureau chief $1,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman assumes that I am the whole committee, which is far from the truth. I am only one member of the committee.

Mr. RUCKER. I have always found that the gentleman had his own way about it in the House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], who is a member of the subcommittee, I am sure knows the situation as I know it, and notwithstanding this, makes an appeal that I waive this point of order. I know and the gentleman from Iowa knows that it is my duty as a member of the committee toward the other members of the committee to stand by what that committee did. I feel reasonably sure that if the gentleman from Iowa were in my place in this particular instance, he would feel constrained, notwithstanding his own personal feelings in the matter, to make the point of order, and I therefore insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "$1,500" and insert "$1,600," on line 12, page 24.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 12, strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,600."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, for the reason heretofore stated, I must make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Distribution of card indexes: For service in connection with distribution of card indexes and other publications of the library; Chief of division, $3,000; chief assistant, $1,800; assistants—2 at $1,600 each, 3 at $1,500 each, 3 at $1,400 each, 4 at $1,200 each, 4 at $1,100 each, 4 at $1,000 each; for services of assistants at salaries less than $1,000 per annum and for piecework and work by the hour, $17,000, including not exceeding $500 for freight charges, expressage, traveling expenses connected with such distribution, and expenses of attendance at meetings when incurred on the written authority and direction of the librarian, $46,900.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like the attention of the chairman of the committee. I have been trying to find the paragraph under the title of Library of Congress, which contained a provision for printing of documents.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is carried in the sundry civil bill and is not carried in this bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I inquire of the gentleman if there is in this bill no provision of any character in reference to printing documents?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This does not carry any provision for the printing in the Library.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman's committee, the Committee on Appropriations, reports the sundry civil bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; but it is prepared by a different subcommittee.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I understand; that may be; but may I be permitted to make this observation: Certain documents have been issued by the Library of Congress in recent years of extreme value from a historic point of view, and from the standpoint of information. Among others, I refer to the publication of the proceedings of the second Continental Congress which sat throughout the Revolutionary War. I notice that the publication of this document has been suspended; that is, no further publications have occurred in about three years. I took this up with the Librarian of Congress and he informed me that the reason was their appropriation for printing had either been cut down or found insufficient to do this and other work.

It seems to me that out of all the documents that the Government publishes these that come from the Library of Congress are, by and large, the most meritorious from most any standpoint. At all events, they are of a high character and of high grade. If they are handicapped in the matter of funds for printing, it seems to me the Committee on Appropriations ought to take care of that item.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the current law gives the Congressional Library $200,000 for printing.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is that the same sum they have had from year to year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the same that they have had for several years.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If they have a shortage it is because of printing other documents of greater importance?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Possibly so.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I admit that the sum of $200,000 is a considerable item. Has the gentleman any information as to how many important documents like the one I have called attention to have been suspended for lack of funds for printing?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I have not. That is a matter that we did not consider in connection with this bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment, to second with what emphasis I can summon what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has just said. The First and Second Continental Congresses, from the standpoint of our history, occupy a very unique and important period in our country. Prior to this period two attempts had been made by the colonies to come together, the Albany Council in 1754 and the stamp-act congress in 1765. But the Continental Congresses were the first legislative bodies. The first one lasted only about six weeks and came into session in 1774, in September. It announced a Bill of Rights, and then adjourned, to meet again provided England did not heed its requests. The second one came into session the 10th of May, as I remember, 1775, and continued as one body, and covering that very interesting period running through the entire Revolutionary War up to the time of the adoption of the Articles of Confederation, which was the 1st of March, 1781. This body was revolutionary, both in the manner of its authority in assembling and in the power it exercised. It was superseded in 1781, two years before England recognized our independence, by the Congress provided for in the Articles of Confederation, which were adopted under the authority of that Congress. That particular period has no record of any legislative proceedings outside of this record of this Continental Congress. There were about 15 different presidents of these two Congresses, including the country's most famous names. In this connection it is interesting to us to recall that wonderful statement of William Pitt, who, in speaking of this particular Second Continental Congress, said that for wisdom of conclusion, force of sagacity, and solidity of reasoning, that body had never been excelled in the history of the world. The Second Continental Congress covered one of the most interesting periods in the history of legislative life, not only in America but in the world. It was the span that connected the period when 13 separate colonies all exercised more or less legislative power separately, and the same colonies exercised that power as a confederation. For a long time these documents were unpublished. They were in scattered form. Some years ago the Government began to show proper interest in permanent preservation of the records of important proceedings of our fathers in various times of activity. This is one item. These proceedings have been brought together and published by the Government. The Government has published many documents covering the period of the Constitution, including documentary history of the Constitution. These and other such documents should be placed in every university and college library; it would be very valuable contributions for the study of our early history and should be looked upon as a wonderful achievement. It would seem to me that every Congressman ought to have them in his own library.

Mr. PLATT. Is that the set of some 39 or 40 volumes?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Twenty-three have thus far been published.

Mr. PLATT. There is a whole shelf of them. I have got them.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Those are the ones.

Mr. PLATT. Can not any library get them?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; the publication has been discontinued.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How many volumes were ever printed?

Mr. FESS. I do not remember.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Twenty-three volumes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How many sets?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not know.

Mr. FESS. The proceedings of the First Continental Congress were printed in two volumes, as I now recall—perhaps but one. Those of the Second Congress ran through a period of years and go beyond 20 volumes, as I remember.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman does not know how many sets were published?

Mr. FESS. No; but they could not be very numerous, since only libraries and special history students would demand them. Of course, to a body of men like this they would be valuable.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It seems to me there is a scarcity of them, a limited number of sets being published. They are very valuable and more ought to be published.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For procuring manure, soil, tools, fuel; purchasing trees, shrubs, plants, and seeds; services, including skilled laborers and laborers at not exceeding $2 per diem; materials and miscellaneous supplies; traveling expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence of the superintendent and his assistants not to exceed $200; street car tickets not exceeding $25; office equipment and contingent expenses in connection with repairs and improvements to Botanic Gardens; care and maintenance of motor-propelled delivery vehicle; under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library, $15,000.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to ask a question in regard to the item which has just been read, referring particularly to that providing for laborers at $2 per diem. Did those men get the benefit of the last summer increase?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They did. The gentleman refers to the 5 and 10 per cent increase?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They did.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what is going to be done about the removal of the Botanic Garden?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not tell the gentleman. I think there is a bill now pending providing for its removal.

Mr. COX. The bill which we passed through the House never did go through the Senate.

Mr. FESS. I do not know.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, perhaps I am in a position to give the gentleman some information. In the last Congress, I think it was, we passed through the House a bill providing for the removal of the Botanic Garden and that it be placed in Rock Creek Park. In another body that measure met with opposition, particularly that part which referred to the Botanic Garden proper. A gentleman in the other body, chairman of the committee having the bill in charge, was favorable to the idea of having the arboretum transferred to Rock Creek Park, but was opposed to having the garden proper transferred, and the bill met the usual death that bills meet with when opposed by one person in another body.

Mr. FESS. Does that mean that the garden will remain where it is?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet; but the Botanic Garden, including the fence around it, has been the subject of a good deal of comment of late years——

Mr. FESS. Has it not been ordered taken away?

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). Will remain until both bodies can come to some agreement as to what shall be done. Those who have studied the subject believe that Rock Creek Park is the proper place for the permanent establishment of the Botanic Garden. Sooner or later, as soon as the plans devised by the Art Commission are developed into fruition, of course the Botanic Garden will have to be removed, but with the large temporary office buildings in Henry Park and the adjoining parks, that, of course, must be postponed until the termination of the war and for some years thereafter.

Mr. FESS. My concern arose from a good deal of talk about the removal of it, and I thought we had once authorized it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill passed through the House after thorough consideration, as I recall, two Congresses ago, but nothing has been done with the proposal since that time.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. How many skilled and unskilled laborers are secured at the price of $2 per day?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They vary in number. They are not employed, as the gentleman knows, regularly, but as they are needed. Sometimes he has a greater force than at others.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman mean that he can get skilled and unskilled laborers at $2 for the entire day?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There has been no complaint made by the Superintendent of the Botanic Garden. I will say to the gentleman that up until a year ago the per diem paid to the laborers was $1.75, but it was increased to $2 a year ago.

They now get $2 and the 10 per cent increase which was allowed for the current year.

Mr. TILSON. But wages of laborers in other parts of the country have gone up not 25 per cent but they have gone up 100 per cent.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will understand, of course, the work required of these particular laborers does not require any particular amount of skill. I fancy that all that is required is one who knows how to handle a hoe or a rake, and, of course, that class of labor is not paid the same sum that is paid to laborers to whom the gentleman refers.

Mr. TILSON. My own experience was that ordinary laborers, leaving off the word "skilled," that the ordinary laborers were receiving a much higher wage in most parts of the country than $2 per day.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say there was no complaint of any kind made by the Superintendent of the Botanical Gardens and no request for an increase of the rate.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as it is drawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Bureau of Efficiency, authorized by the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved February 28, 1916, to establish and maintain a system of efficiency ratings, to investigate administrative needs of the service relating to personnel in the several executive departments and independent establishments, required by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1913 and 1914, respectively, and to investigate duplication of statistical and other work and methods of business in the various branches of the Government service; for purchase or exchange of equipment, supplies, stationery, books and periodicals, printing and binding, traveling expenses not exceeding $3,000, and street car fare not exceeding $50; in all, $110,000: Provided, That no persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $4,000 per annum except the chief of the bureau, whose compensation is fixed hereby at the rate of $5,000 per annum.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I rose to reserve a point of order also on the section.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice in the current law the same item carrying the same amount exactly, but the totals are different, to quote from the current law—

Provided, That not to exceed $3,000 a year traveling expenses and street car fare not exceeding $50, in all $60,000—

But in the present bill the total is $110,000. How does that come about?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I will say to the gentleman that while the current law carries only $60,000 there were two deficiencies, one of $20,000, which would make a total of $80,000, and the bill which passed the other day carried an amount of $38,000, which would make $118,000, which has already been appropriated for this bureau for the current year.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then how did the gentleman happen to reach the figures of $110,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That was reached in this way, I will say to the gentleman: The estimate submitted to the committee called for $120,000. Now, the Bureau of Efficiency has been conducting a number of investigations; some of them have been completed and others are about finished, and still others are in contemplation. Among the investigations which the bureau has been conducting is one relating to civil-service retirement, the bureau having taken up that investigation under express direction of the Senate by resolution.

Now that has been completed and cost something like $20,000. After full consideration the committee thought that $110,000 would be sufficient to pay the salaries necessary to be employed in this bureau, and that if it developed next year that they needed more money they would have the privilege of coming back to Congress and submitting their request just as they have done this year.

Mr. HAMLIN. What I especially reserved the point of order on was the increase of salary from four to five thousand dollars per annum for the chief of the bureau. Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, just a word or two not only as to this particular item, but other similiar items in this bill. If there are any criticisms, in my judgment, that can be leveled against this bill, it is the fact that the increases of salaries we find in it have been given to those receiving considerable salaries and not to the clerks in the office who do the work, the real labor, and who are receiving only a small amount, not enough really to keep soul and body together in decency. In other words, the bill is top-heavy. I do not believe that is the right attitude for this House to adopt or follow. We find here that the salary of this chief is increased $1,000 per annum. We do not find that the salaries of any of the employees of this bureau are increased a penny. We find in subsequent portions of the bill, one which just follows this, an increase in the Civil Service Commissioners' salaries, one $500 and two $1,000 each per year, without any increase in the wages of a single employee, except four messenger boys, who were given the munificent increase of $5 per month each.

I do not believe that is right, and that same system seems to run all the way through this bill, and I think unless the clerks in the offices receiving $900, $1,000, and $1,100 and $1,200, and those receiving less, down to the laborers, who must pay out as much to live as the man at the head of the bureau must pay, I can not conceive why the high-salaried people should get the increases and the rank and file be ignored. I am going to object and raise the point of order against the increase of all salaries ranging from $3,000, $4,000, $5,000 and up a year unless the clerk who now does the drudgery and gets from $720 to $1,200 or a little more is provided for.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that if he will go through the estimates submitted to the committee and then take this bill as reported, he will find that the committee has reported the fewest number of increases of salaries and only in those cases which seemed to the committee to be compelling.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, if the gentleman will allow me right there, I think the gentleman has put his finger right on the sore spot. When I say this bill should be criticized I do not mean that as a criticism of the members of the committee personally. My criticism goes, and I think the gentleman will agree with me, to the heads of these different departments who make these recommendations, that they make their estimates and make their recommendations to the committee seeking to increase their own salaries and the salaries of others occupying some similar position, and they lose sight entirely or else are indifferent to the clerks who are drawing these small salaries and barely eking out a livelihood. I think that is where the real criticism is deserved.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Do you not think it would weaken their claim for increase, or perhaps have something to do with it, if they recommended an increase for these clerks?

Mr. HAMLIN. If they made too many recommendations possibly none of them would be accepted. They look after number one first, and I do not think that is right. I think that if I am getting a salary of $3,000 or $4,000 a year I have a better chance of maintaining myself in some degree of comfort than some one who is drawing only $1,200 a year or less. I do not mean to say that there are not some men who are worth $10,000 or $12,000 a year, while there are some others that are not worth more than $2,000, perhaps, but these clerks do not make these recommendations and, in fact, do not dare to even make request of the heads of departments for increase. They would be regarded as insubordinate if they were to do so. So the fellows at the head of the departments who are permitted to make these recommendations are not acting fairly by asking an increase of their own salaries and losing sight of the clerks, who really do the hard work. And I am not willing to stand for that kind of business.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN]—and I hope he will not insist on the point of order—that the chief of this bureau did not make any specific request for an increase of his salary. He did submit an estimate, asking that $120,000 be appropriated, and that the limitation now existing in the law be taken off. It came to the attention of the committee that there was a likelihood of this very competent man leaving for other service. He is very efficient. He is an accountant of long experience, and there is no question in my mind but that he could secure much larger salary in private employment.

Now, I am sure, if the gentleman from Missouri and if the other members of the committee would take the time to investigate fully just what this bureau has accomplished and what it is now seeking to accomplish, they would be convinced of the fact that the bureau has saved to the Government of the United States many, many, many times more than has been appropriated for it since it was first created. Now, in the first place, I want to say to the gentleman that a few years ago and about the time a number of clerks were brought to the Treasurer's office from the Subtreasuries——

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield right there, just for a suggestion?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is true; but does the gentleman take into consideration the fact that we are in a war and that everybody is called upon to make sacrifices?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. HAMLIN. And does the gentleman also take into consideration the fact that the President issued an Executive order, and I think properly, prohibiting clerks being transferred from one bureau to another during the war where they could get better pay if they were transferred, but that that is not permitted now, for very good and sufficient reasons, and yet we go to work and increase the salaries of the heads of the bureaus but turn a deaf ear to the clerk?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As indicating the value of this particular gentleman, Mr. Herbert D. Brown's service——

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not care anything about who the man is.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A few years ago the Treasurer's office submitted an estimate to the Congress asking for $213,000 additional for clerical help. I happened to be a member of the subcommittee at the time. On investigation, and in the hearing, the committee became convinced that certain change of method of accounting and disbursing could be put in effect in that office which would do away with the necessity for this greatly increased appropriation. Finally, after considerable discussion and consideration, and with the consent and the entire and hearty approval of the Treasurer, the Bureau of Efficiency was requested to go down to that office and to cooperate with the Treasurer's office in the effort to evolve a different method of transacting the business of that office. And within a week or two the Treasurer came to the committee and submitted a supplemental estimate, in which he cut out the $213,000, and ultimately his former estimate was reduced $50,000.

Now, that is one instance, and one instance only, of what this bureau has accomplished for the Government.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, just a minute. Let me get through.

Mr. HAMLIN. In the interest of accuracy I want to ask this question: Is it not true, though, that while what you say may have happened in one particular department or bureau, that the number of clerks in the service of the Government has gradually increased all the time and appropriations increased in amount all the time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That may be owing to increased business, but certainly the gentleman can not charge that up to the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know whether it is due to increased business or not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I venture the assertion there is not an office or bureau that has been investigated by this Bureau of Efficiency in which there has not been a resulting decrease in clerks and appropriations required. It may be, as in the case of the Internal-Revenue Office, that the appropriations have been greatly increased; but, of course, in that it is due to the fact that we have passed bills providing for the collection of taxes of more than $3,000,000,000, necessarily requiring a greatly increased force. Now, in addition to that, this Bureau of Efficiency was instructed by Congress to investigate the Indian Bureau and its method of accounting and disbursing. It made an extended investigation in the field, and has reported and recommended a different method of accounting and disbursing in so far as the field service of the Indian Bureau is concerned, which has saved admittedly many thousands of dollars to the Indians to whom those funds belong. Those recommendations will be put into effect by the Indian Bureau.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. COX. I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. I agree with my friend from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] that I am not very much enamored of these increases of salaries, especially for these high-class men; but in that connection is it not also true that this Bureau of Efficiency in the last Congress was directed to investigate the question of Subtreasuries, and has not that commission made a recommendation which, if Congress will carry it out, will save the Government $450,000 after the war?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is clearly correct, and I was going to bring that to the attention of the House in a few moments.

Before I get to the point raised by the gentleman from Indiana, however, I want to say that when the present Postmaster General first assumed charge of the Post Office Department, having been a Member of this House and a member of the Committee on Appropriations, he was familiar with the work being done by this Bureau of Efficiency, and immediately upon his assuming charge of that department he called the Bureau of Efficiency into the department and asked it to cooperate with him and with the commission appointed by him for the purpose of seeing whether or not efficiency ratings could not be established.

Now, what has been the result of the work done by this bureau in cooperation with the Post Office Department and with the entire and hearty approval of the Postmaster General? It has resulted, gentlemen, in a net decrease of the clerical force of the Post Office Department by 189 persons, drawing salaries annually aggregating $174,360. That is not for one year, but it has been for several years, and it will continue on and on. So I say it is impossible to estimate just what this Bureau of Efficiency has been worth to the Government since its creation.

The gentleman from Indiana referred to the Subtreasuries. Last year Congress directed the Bureau of Efficiency to investigate whether or not it would be possible to eliminate or discontinue the Subtreasuries. They have submitted a very full, and, I may say, a very able report, which has been published in the form of a document, and I hope that every Member here will get that document and read it carefully before we reach the provisions with reference to Subtreasuries in this bill. They recommend that the Subtreasuries be discontinued after the war, and your committee has followed their recommendation and submitted such a proposition to Congress. Now, as the gentleman from Indiana says, if that provision is adopted it will save $450,000 a year, not for one year, but for all years to come.

Now, in addition to that, they were called in by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Director of the War-Risk Bureau when they began to form the organization for that great bureau, having now 1,700 employees and which will be increased to 2,900. The Bureau of Efficiency was requested by the Secretary of the Treasury to go to that particular bureau and assist those in charge in organizing on an efficiency basis; and the Director of the War-Risk Bureau, in his hearings before the committee, paid high tribute to the Bureau of Efficiency, and particularly to its chief, Mr. Brown, for the splendid services he had rendered in assisting to put that bureau upon an efficient basis.

Now, that is not all. Under direction of Congress the Bureau of Efficiency was directed to investigate the methods of business in the Internal Revenue Office. By the entire consent and hearty approval of the present Internal Revenue Commissioner, Mr. Roper, and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, this Bureau of Efficiency, with a part of its force, has been for some time in the Internal Revenue Commissioner's office investigating and assisting and cooperating with the Internal Revenue Commissioner in order to put his great force upon the best possible efficiency basis. I am not violating any confidence when I say that I saw a letter from the Internal Revenue Commissioner—in fact, a copy was sent to me, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—in which he took occasion to refer to the work that this Bureau of Efficiency had been doing in his bureau and suggested that the work done by it and the expert knowledge required of those who are capable of doing this kind of work prompted him to say that they ought to receive better salaries at the hands of Congress.

Now, that is not all. A moment ago I referred to the fact that the Senate had passed a resolution directing the Bureau of Efficiency to make investigations with a view of establishing facts concerning the advisability or nonadvisability of putting into effect civil-service retirement legislation. This committee has spent months in the performance of that duty, and I understand it has made its report to the chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service of the Senate. That is not all. This Bureau of Efficiency was directed to investigate and report upon the rates of pay and the question of a reclassification of the employees of this Government, and they have been proceeding with that inquiry and are in a position to make a partial report if not a full report.

Then, in addition to that, they were directed by legislation to cooperate with the Pension Commissioner to determine the value of machines for addressing checks in the Pension Office, the sum of $4,000 having been appropriated to purchase some necessary machines. Those investigations have been made and the machines have been purchased.

Gentlemen, these are some of the things that this Bureau of Efficiency has accomplished, and I say without fear of successful contradiction by anyone who has carefully investigated the great work that has been done by this bureau that it has saved hundreds of thousands of dollars to this Government. For my part, I would not deny a single necessary dollar to a bureau of efficiency such as this, charged as it is with the duty of investigating the expenditures of the people's money, making investigations for Congress, and rendering aid in placing the departments of our Government on the best possible business and efficiency basis.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit me right there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Neither am I seeking to withhold from that bureau whatever money is necessary for them to carry on their work, but the committee seems not to have been solicitous about anybody in that bureau, those who are doing the actual work, except the chief himself, and you want to raise his salary.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman that there is absolutely no limitation placed on the pay of employees there, and never has been, except the $4,000 limitation.

Mr. HAMLIN. I venture the assertion that they are not getting any more than the average clerks receive.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Dr. Holcomb, who was professor of government in Harvard University is now drawing $3,600 under this appropriation. He is a man of splendid experience and training.

Mr. HAMLIN. You are not seeking to raise his salary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; but if this is provided the chief of the bureau will get $5,000 and the other employees of that bureau will get under $4,000. I think there are about 30 employees in that bureau, and my impression is that their average compensation is about $2,700 or $2,800.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are 10 of the employees of this bureau who receive $3,000 and over. In the administration of this bureau it is very necessary to have high-priced men of rare ability. The commercial world to-day is demanding and paying salaries of twice the amount that these people are receiving from the Government, and it is most difficult to retain in the Government service these accountants, who are being sought after by accounting concerns and others to assist them in the preparation of their income-tax returns and war-profits returns. That is the testimony before our committee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennesee. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that in the aviation department and possibly in the War Department there are accountants now who are drawing from $4,000 to $6,000 a year. In fact, the Civil Service Commission are holding an examination now for accountants, some of whom will get $6,000 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. The testimony before the committee shows that in the department where there is no limit on the amount which may be paid for the services of experts war conditions to-day demand and they are paying the salaries paid in commercial lines, which are above $4,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In determining the salary of a chief of a bureau in framing a bill of this magnitude the committee must take into consideration the pay of the chiefs of the bureaus of other departments. If you scan this bill you will find no instance—there may be an exceptional case—where any chief of a bureau receives less than $5,000. The Commissioner General of the Land Office receives $5,000; the Commissioner of Indian Affairs receives $5,000; the Commissioner of Pensions, $5,000; the Commissioner of Patents, $5,000. The same is true of the head of the Bureau of Immigration and the head of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. It has been the rule, and the subcommittee has been very careful when they do find themselves impelled by conditions to raise a salary, never to go above the salary that is provided for like positions in other departments.

Now, what were the conditions that presented themselves to the committee so far as the increase of the salary of this valuable man at the head of this great bureau is concerned? The Members know that a few years ago this was a branch of the Civil Service Commission. It was hampered in its work while a division of that commission. The Committee on Appropriations thought it wise, so that they would not be restricted in activity, so that they could go into any department of the Government at the direction of Congress and investigate conditions there, to make it an independent bureau. So three years ago we established the Bureau of Efficiency and placed the salary of the head of that bureau at $4,000.

The salary list for the men in the employ of that bureau shows that 10 are employed above $3,000, 1 at $3,800, 2 at $3,600, and others between $3,600 and $3,000, and 10, I believe, employed at a salary of between $2,000 and $3,000. That is the practical situation that confronted us. We have a man at the head of the bureau who is in charge of this responsible work having men receiving a salary of $3,800 and $3,600 under him. Instances have been cited by the chairman of the subcommittee where men have been loaned to the bureau for work in this exigency who can receive more money in the commercial world, but who are willing to come here and aid the Government at the statutory salary. Here we have only $200 difference between the salary of the head of the bureau and the employees, with responsibility of work the value of which can not be counted, as narrated by the chairman of the committee, that is saving the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars, and at present engaged in other work of an independent character that will result in a great saving, receiving but $4,000, out of proportion to the salary paid to the head of the bureaus in charge of responsibilities similar to those with which this bureau is charged.

The gentleman makes the unwarranted charge against the report of the committee on this bill that we have given more consideration to the higher-class officials and not sufficient consideration to the salaries of the clerks. There is no appropriation bill that is presented to Congress that involves the detail that this bill does. It relates to the clerks and officials in all the executive departments of the Government and also to the legislative and judicial branches as well. The hearings show that the head of this bureau, when pressed by the exigencies of the committee, was called to investigate the wages being paid throughout the country to the employees in the commercial and industrial establishments of a similar grade of work to those provided in this bill; that he worked until beyond midnight in order to prepare a chart of the pay of the different classes so that the committee would have some reliable information upon which to act in determining the percentage of increase that the committee would recommend to this House for all Government employees to receive by reason of the high cost of living.

What did that chart show? It showed that the Government to-day for similar work was paying higher wages in the clerical grade of $1,200 and under than is paid in private establishments, and that in the grade from $1,600 to $1,800 the Government for that character of work is paying somewhat less. But that the Government had been paying more even in those grades prior to the time when there was a rapid increase in private employment occasioned by the withdrawal of men in commercial employment into the war. The head of that bureau devoted hour after hour in the preparation of that character of work. The Postmaster General has given him a letter of credit——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. RUCKER. Reserving the right to object, I want to say that when the gentleman from Wisconsin gets through I hope to get the eye of the Chair, because the committee has had about time enough on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. So, Mr. Chairman, the committee can not be charged with presenting a bill that is any way top-heavy. In fact, we have not increased the salary of the high grade of individuals except in a very few instances, and this is one which I believe can be well defended, and has been well defended by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Of course, the gentleman understands that I did not mean to be severe in my criticisms. The fact is, however, I find that the bill bears out the statement I have made, that a majority of the increases have been in the higher offices, and not in the little ones.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I have here a statement made by the clerk of our committee, comprising 21 typewritten pages, containing the increases recommended by the committee. I read that over closely last evening, and I shall loan it to the gentleman so that he may have at his command the increases recommended in the bill. If he will go through the pages he will find that the recommendations made by the committee have been, first, that we have leveled up every laboring man who was receiving less than the statutory pay and put him at the statutory rate. He will also find that we have increased the pay of artisans, and he will also find that in the lower grades of clerks of a thousand dollars, twelve hundred dollars, fourteen hundred dollars, we have in the respective departments made increases, and in addition to that we have made those increases in those lower grades with the full contemplation that this committee would bring in a more favorable recommendation for a horizontal percentage increase to all of the employees than it did last year.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, of course I can not nor can any other Member anticipate what the committee will do in the future. I am talking about this bill. Take the Civil Service Commission. The committee has recommended an increase of $500 to the president of that commission and a thousand dollars increase to each one of the other two commissioners. Of the over 100 clerks in that bureau alone you have recommended to four messenger boys an increase of $5 a month each. Does not that bear out my statement that this bill is "top-heavy"?

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not, because the gentleman speaks only a half truth.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is absolutely the whole truth.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. We provide in the Civil Service Commission for additional employees to the amount of $150,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not talking about additional employees.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it is under that omnibus clause that we can provide additional help at increased salaries. If the gentleman wants the specific information as to the Civil Service Commission and what we did as to those lower-grade clerks I will call attention to just what we did. The gentleman says that the only increase was with some messenger boys. Permit me to call his attention to the fact—and I hope the gentleman will give me his attention, having asked me the question——

Mr. HAMLIN. I shall be delighted to give the gentleman my undivided attention.

Mr. STAFFORD. Last year we provided 6 of class 4, which is the $1,800 grade, in the Civil Service Commission. This year we increase that grade to 9. Last year we provided 28 of class 3——

Mr. HAMLIN. The print I have reads "6 at $1,800," just the same as it is in the current law.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has not the amended form of the bill. They have two bills here, one for the committee and one for the lay Members of the House.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, is that it? I have the bill furnished me at the desk.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is identical with the current law.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not the bill they are considering.

Mr. STAFFORD. With the aid of the additional information furnished by the genial gentleman from Illinois, of course, it is not necessary for us to say much further, but the fact is that we have provided additional help and allowances for the Civil Service Commission to meet their needs.

Mr. HAMLIN. But it is also true that you recommend increase in pay only for the heads of the bureau and not for the clerks.

Mr. MADDEN and Mr. RUCKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois were a member of this great and august, this most powerful and almost arrogant committee, I would surrender the floor——

Mr. MADDEN. But since I am not, I bow in reverence to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. I could tell from the genial smile on the gentleman's face to whom reference has just been made that he is not a member of that committee. Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat perplexed over this——

Mr. MADDEN. I am sorry to hear that. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman is always sympathetic. Mr. Chairman, here in the last few minutes discussion has clustered around items of increases of compensation and, as suggested by my colleague [Mr. HAMLIN], and I think, with all deference to others, that it looks like his suggestion is well founded, though, of course, it can not be true——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield? That must be due to the fact the gentleman is from Missouri, and you have got to show him. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois lives very close to Missouri, and if he will just cross the Mississippi River he will be shown.

Mr. Chairman, the suggestion has been made, and I think correctly, that it seems in some way or another some great chieftain, some man who presides over a great bureau, perhaps the Bureau of Efficiency, may make a more vivid and more lasting impression upon the minds and hearts of gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations than men who do the real drudgery which gives fame to those chieftains.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Missouri say the "hearts" of members of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. RUCKER. I did that in deference to the members because they have the forms of human beings, I want to say by way of parentheses. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, members of that committee vie with each other in fervid eloquence, deep pathos, and much enthusiasm, occupying the floor most of the time, in defending their bill, which, I think, is subject to a good deal of just criticism. The distinguished and worthy gentleman from Tennessee, having this bill in charge, talked eloquently and forcefully——

Mr. MADDEN. And mightily.

Mr. RUCKER. And made a speech wonderful for its depth and breadth and length, and especially for its length——

Mr. MADDEN. And vision.

Mr. RUCKER. In defending his committee's action. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] came to his rescue and held the floor during two or three extensions of his time.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman be able to select a man who could come to his rescue in any better form?

Mr. RUCKER. Admirably, sir; admirably; it was a wonderful defense, and yet, Mr. Chairman, within the hour a most distinguished and learned Member of this Congress stood before this committee and detailed to us the incomparable achievements of a man who is not drawing a great salary, a man who could only have acquired the inexhaustible store of valuable information he has accumulated and which he imparts to the Members of this House and of the Senate of the United States and others every day, by long, assiduous, faithful, patient toil and struggle, and yet, when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is appealed to, appealed to pathetically by gentlemen on this side of the aisle and gentlemen on that side, while admitting all the facts recited and conceding the force of the arguments made, he tells us that by reason of the ironclad rules of the Committee on Appropriations, by which he is fettered and bound, his manhood—no, I will not say that, but will say his judgment as a Member of this House—is taken from him, that he is compelled to obey the mandates of that committee, and therefore he must insist upon the point of order and prevent the House from considering meritorious amendments.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. In one minute. And when a gentleman from this side of the aisle, a member of the Appropriations Committee, ran across the aisle with hands stretched out pathetically and earnestly pleading, "My friend, after we voted on this question information came to me that I did not know before," the gentleman from Tennessee, determined in his way, and autocratic in his will, entrenched behind the orders of this great and powerful committee, said, "Oh, I knew all about those things." Yes; the gentleman from Tennessee knew how many boys this man working for a meager salary had given to his country to be sent to the war; he knew his long and faithful service; he knew the pitiful salary he was being paid, and yet he said, "I passed on all those questions and determined that $1,500 was enough for him." But when we reach this item he pleads with us that because a secretary of one of the departments of Government said the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency did a great work and saved the country large sums of money, we should yield to the wisdom and bow with respectful deference to the action of the Committee on Appropriations, though its action is without authority or sanction of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of the Appropriations Committee, but I ask the indulgence of the committee for a few minutes longer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. RUCKER. Five minutes, and if I do not use that the committee will not censure me.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. It might be interesting to know that the young assistant of Mr. Washington has been called to the Ordnance Department, leaving a salary of $1,200 over here, and he is now being paid $2,400.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman says it might be interesting to me to know that?

Mr. FESS. It might be interesting to the committee.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman is too wise to indulge that forlorn hope. I doubt if the gentleman, with all his learning, can suggest anything interesting to the committee, unless he suggests absolute submission to its will.

Mr. Chairman, I speak with great respect of the Committee on Appropriations. I concede to them for the moment, although I may not abide in that concession, that it is the embodiment of all the wisdom and all the patriotism of the House. I say I might concede it, and to do so would not offend the committee, but I will not concede it. I do concede that it is a great committee, each member possessing a towering intellect and each a loyal, faithful public servant. But the trouble is we have allowed ourselves to drift into a rut, a rut that the Democrats fell heir to as an inheritance of the old party which we succeeded in power, a custom of allowing committees to write into a bill what it desires and to keep out of a bill everything not in harmony with its sweet will; and I tell you, in the language of Shakespeare, "It is a custom more honored in the breach than in the observance." We allow the committees of the House to domineer and rule the House. If the time should ever come when the baseless accusations against us shall be true and this House does in fact become a worthless and useless body, it will be because we shall have degenerated into a lot of moral cowards, afraid to do the things we know ought to be done, and ignominiously cringe and bow to the autocratic will of some chairman or subchairman of a committee. I for one am determined to break the shackles which some committees attempt to put on me if I have manhood and power left to do it. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I take it the point of order has been made. But I want to announce now that it is my purpose, if the point reserved is not adhered to, to make the point of order myself. I will not remain silent merely because gentlemen cry, "High taxes, great burdens, enormous expenses of war," and give these as reasons for their action and as a response to the piteous wails that come to us from the poor when I observe them turn to the other side and grasp hands with a man who is drawing a higher salary than others performing equally valuable services, living in the same community, and having to bear the same kind of living expense. If I can discover them, I will make a point of order against every proposed increase of salary where the salary is already fixed at a high figure, until the committee shows some disposition to respond to the cry of those who really need help. But the trouble is you can not find them. It takes an expert to locate one of these items. Nobody but the chief of the Efficiency Bureau can tell what is in the bill.

We ought to quit carrying barbers on the pay roll of this Government as laborers. Gentlemen may declaim and proclaim as much as they please that these barbers—these laborers, as designated in this bill—work themselves to death trying to keep this Hall clean when Congress is not in session, but the question arises, if they are laborers, why are qualified barbers, and only barbers eligible for appointment to those places? Strange to say, here in this bill we provide pay for common laborers, but before you get on the eligible list to fill one of these positions you have got to be a barber. Why, Mr. Chairman, the chairman of this great committee [Mr. SHERLEY], the chairman of this subcommittee [Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee], nor his able assistant on that side of the aisle [Mr. STAFFORD], neither one of them could qualify as common laborers within the meaning of the words as used in this bill, because they are not barbers. They may shave us—and I think they do sometimes—but they do not use lather in doing it. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, if these men are to be carried on the roll, they ought to be carried as barbers, or else gentlemen ought to come out like men in the open and say to the American people, "We have some particular pets"—God knows, they are not mine—"and we are paying them under the guise of laborers out of the public crib, but they really are barbers and nothing more." But for fear some one would be lacerated and torn at home these barbers are concealed under the more attractive term of "common laborers."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

This has been a delightfully interesting day. The speeches of the committeemen have been edifying and instructive, and it seems to me that in view of all the good things they have said and the information they have imparted, and the intelligence they have displayed, and in view of the progress the committee has made in this work, those of us who are not members of the committee ought to be given a chance to go home and study over the words of wit and wisdom that have been uttered. And I therefore raise the question of no quorum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield just a minute? Why could we not dispose of this?

Mr. MADDEN. I think we ought to adjourn. The gentleman has taken up all the afternoon making speeches.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say something in reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. MADDEN. I think you can do that to-morrow. I want to make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point of no quorum. Evidently the point is well taken.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10358, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6361. An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 6, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to give written notice of an intention to move to suspend the rule when the Agricultural appropriation bill is under consideration, and authorize an amendment thereto, being the joint resolution 132, to increase the price of wheat to $2.50 a bushel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice given by the Senator from Oklahoma will be duly entered.

The notice is as follows:

I hereby give notice that when the Agricultural appropriation bill, H. R. 9054, is being considered in the Senate, I shall move to suspend paragraph 3 of Rule XVI, prohibiting the reception of general legislation to any general appropriation bill, in order that I may propose the following amendment, to be inserted at the proper place in said bill as a new paragraph:

"That section 14 of the act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917, be amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 14. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. The President shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain standards act, approved August 11, 1916. The President shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as he shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment and differences in price for the several standard grades at the local elevator or the local railway market where such wheat is delivered from the farm where produced, adopting No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent as the basis. Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guarantee within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. In such regulations the President shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 2 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2.50 per bushel at the local elevator or the local railway market where such wheat is delivered from the farm where produced.

"'This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute, and shall be binding until May 1, 1919. When the President finds that the importation into the United States of any wheat produced outside of the United States materially enhances or is likely materially to enhance the liabilities of the United States under guaranties of prices therefor made pursuant to this section, and ascertains what rate of duty, added to the then existing rate of duty on wheat and to the value of wheat at the time of importation, would be sufficient to bring the price thereof at which imported up to the price fixed therefor pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall proclaim such facts, and thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon wheat when imported, in addition to the then existing rate of duty, the rate of duty so ascertained; but in no case shall any such rate of duty be fixed at an amount which will effect a reduction of the rate of duty upon wheat under any then existing tariff law of the United States. For the purpose of making any guaranteed price effective under this section, or whenever he deems it essential in order to protect the Government of the United States against material enhancement of its liabilities arising out of any guaranty under this section, the President is authorized also, in his discretion, to purchase any wheat for which a guaranteed price shall be fixed under this section, and to hold, transport, or store it, or to sell, dispose of, and deliver the same to any citizen of the United States or to any Government engaged in war with any country with which the Government of the United States is or may be at war, or to use the same as supplies for any department or agency of the Government of the United States. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the sale or disposal of wheat under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.'"

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to strike out all of section 8.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate for many minutes. Of course, I take it that every Senator will agree that in the present situation it is highly important that the resources of this country of capital, of labor, and material should be conserved in every possible way in order that the Government may secure the things which are necessary to win the war. That is a conclusion which has been reached as a result of experience by our allies. England started out in this war with the idea that it was not necessary in any way to impose restrictions upon ordinary business, and for a long time no restrictions were imposed, but a situation was created which made it necessary to change that policy. It was discovered that the nonessential industries were absorbing a large part of the capital, were utilizing a large part of the labor and materials of the country, and that the production of these things imposed a heavy burden upon the transportation facilities of the country. As a result it was determined to impose first moderate restrictions upon the use of capital in the production of unnecessary things. That policy has progressed until it can be said that as a general thing no business is permitted to be conducted in Great Britain to-day unless it is thought to be necessary in connection with the war. France has had the same experience.

We were confronted by the same situation, and to meet it the Secretary of the Treasury upon his own initiative organized in the Treasury Department in connection with the Federal Reserve System a committee for the purpose of investigating and passing upon issues for new capital not thought to be necessary or contributory to the war. That policy is being pursued to-day in this country just as it is being pursued in Italy, in France, and in Great Britain. So I take it it may be assumed it is the consensus of opinion as the result of experience in all the allied countries that it is important for the winning of the war that the capital, labor, and materials should be conserved for the purpose of being used by the industries that are engaged in war work.

Upon its face the British system appears to be a voluntary system, but behind that system is a power which has the force and effectiveness of law. The defense of the realm act in that country invests in the Government broad powers, sufficient to authorize the creation of the commission or board that they have set up. If it has not been created and organized as an official institution it is well known that in a day, at the discretion of the Government, it may be given that sanction. The same thing is true of the French system. There is no such authority in this country. This voluntary committee can not be given official authority except by statutory enactment.

Mr. President, I do not find any opposition, or, if any, but negligible opposition, to the Government exercising through a voluntary committee advisory powers with respect to new capital issues.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. This voluntary committee advises the Federal reserve banking system.

Mr. SIMMONS. It advises the public.

Mr. HARDWICK. But it has no possible effect except on the operation of the banks through the reserve system.

Mr. SIMMONS. And on the operation of the investment public, so far as it may be influenced by its findings with respect to the compatibility of the issue with the public interest.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, that might have a moral effect, but I mean it has no financial effect.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has no binding effect; yet to a very large extent its findings have been accepted and acted upon, both by the banks and the investment public, but not as fully, probably, as is desirable. For that reason it is thought necessary that it should be made a legal body and that its action should have the legal force and effect.

As I was saying when interrupted, speaking generally, there seems to be but little objection to a committee such as we now have, and to what it is doing or the object sought to be accomplished, because its functions are only advisory and its findings are not as effective as is desirable.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from North Carolina speaks of their disregarding the limitations which are——

Mr. SIMMONS. No; disregarding the findings of this board. As I understand, this board does this: It simply, after making its investigation, advises the banks and the public that a particular issue of capital securities is or is not regarded by it as compatible with the public interest, and its findings ordinarily determine the attitude of the banks and private investors with respect to that issue.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Right there let me say to the Senator from North Carolina that in my State and in most of the other States such securities of public utility companies as are issued must first bear the investigation of a State board, and they must be approved by the State authorities before they can be put out at all. When they have been put out, they must have an earning power which justifies their issuance. After you get that far, it is then proposed to arrest the privilege of citizens to make use of such a credit. That is a very drastic power.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there are boards of that sort in the several States; they existed in peace times as well as now. Their purpose is to deal with the sufficiency of the security and questions relating to the protection of the investment market.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and the bona fides of the corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the bona fides of the corporation. This committee in the Treasury Department does not attempt in any way whatsoever to deal with the question of the bona fides of the issue or of the sufficiency of the security which it may be proposed to emit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee deals only with the question of whether the operations of the concern proposing to issue the securities are necessary or contributory to the war; that is all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that; and that is a tremendous power to lodge in the hands of any single individual, especially when the authorities of the State have carefully examined the entire matter and approved the plan.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not the proposition I am addressing myself to, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has thus far allowed the debate to run along in very informal fashion, but he must hereafter insist that a Senator desiring to interrupt another Senator who has the floor must first address the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I ask the privilege of interrupting the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I shall finish what I have to say in a word. It is merely this, that it is now proposed after a State has found an enterprise to be desirable and wholesome and worthy of credit, that the enterprise must still run the gantlet of a single officer, perhaps, at the Federal Treasury before it can find appropriate standing in the financial markets of the country. I think that is a tremendous power, and if it were to be exercised by a board such as compose the Federal reserve boards, who have knowledge of the local community and its necessities and the needs of the people who apply for assistance, I would not find fault with it at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. It may be wise to encourage many industries in times of peace which should not only not be encouraged but restrained in times of war. I think opinion in the countries at war to-day has finally crystallized in the belief that in order to conserve the capital of the country for war purposes it is essential that unnecessary expenditures should be curtailed and restricted.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. HARDWICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I merely want to make a suggestion to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] in answer to the question asked by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. We will suppose that in Michigan its people decide that they want to spend $50,000,000 for good roads in that automobile State.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; or for building a park.

Mr. McCUMBER. That enterprise will take thousands and thousands of men besides millions of dollars that ought to go into war purposes. That might be a splendid thing for Michigan, and, especially in peace times, it would be a splendid thing; but I think that the interests of the Government are such that those charged with carrying on this war should have some voice in deciding whether or not at this time that amount of money should be spent for such a purpose in any State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from North Carolina will allow me I desire to say that we do not propose to do what the Senator from North Dakota describes; but suppose a concern wanted to refund an obligation already issued and soon maturing upon a useful enterprise, having the approval of the authorities of the State and having an unquestioned market, is he to be deprived of that privilege and is it to fall by the mere ipse dixit of the head of the Treasury Department? If so, chaos and disorder will surround private business undertakings.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Michigan as seriously contending that in the conditions now existing no effort should be made by the Government to conserve the capital of the country for war purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from North Carolina to get that impression.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that is the logical conclusion one would reach from the Senator's argument.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want the Senator from North Carolina to get that impression. I want him to get the impression that what I seek to do in the perfection of some relief legislation is to avoid the temptation to favoritism. I am not referring to any particular persón or board; I am aiming at possible favoritism and desire the widest possible field in the application of this proposed law.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I merely want to ask the Senator from North Carolina one question, and then I shall be through with this part of the debate. Does the Senator think that it is either right or that it can possibly be lawful for us to pass any sort of a law that will prohibit an individual—I am not now mentioning a corporation—from lending his money to whomsoever he pleases, or from giving it away, or from doing anything else that he cares to do with it?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the money that an individual has, the money that the great capitalists of this country have, is as necessary to the winning of the war as is money in the bank; and if the Government, through a well-considered and wise public policy, shall reach the conclusion that the exigencies of the situation require that the money of the country, whether in the hands of the banks or in the hands of individuals, should not be dissipated in being employed in those things that do not contribute to the war, and which are unnecessary at this time, the Government has the right by legislation, indirectly if not directly—and it is by indirection that we seek to accomplish this purpose—to make such provisions as will effectually secure such capital for the purpose in which the Government is engaged, for, in my judgment, the only business of this Government and the only business of the people of this country, whether they be bankers or capitalists, is the winning of this war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] suggested a few moments ago to the Senator from North Carolina that, if this power were put in the Federal Reserve Board, he would not object to that. I only wanted to call his attention to the fact.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not hear that statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That, if this power is put in the Reserve Board, three members of that board and two citizens selected by the reserve board will perform the duties. The only reason these two additional members were added was because the view of the Federal Reserve Board was that they would need additional help.

Mr. SIMMONS. The statement of the Senator from Georgia is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course, I would not have the Senator from Georgia think that I do not understand how this board is to be composed. When I speak of the Federal reserve bank I refer to the 12 Federal reserve banks, who could appropriately clear these securities through their banks after a well-considered and carefully planned scrutiny; and I think the object desired could be easily attained by an amendment to the Federal reserve bank act, which would obviate much of the danger which I see in the plan now proposed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the statement has been made repeatedly upon this floor—the Senator from Michigan is not the first one who has uttered it—that this bill proposes to place in the hands of one man the enormous power of regulating the business affairs of this country. I suppose he means place it in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. This bill proposes no such thing. This bill creates a committee composed of five members, three of them to be members of the Federal Reserve Board and two of them to be outsiders. It is true the Secretary of the Treasury is to be a member of that committee. So is he a member of the Federal Reserve Board; but because the Secretary of the Treasury is a member of the Federal Reserve Board nobody will contend that he controls and dominates the action of that board, and nobody ought to contend that, by reason of his being a member of the committee it is proposed to create by this bill, the power will be lodged in his hands and not in the hands of the committee and that he will dominate its action.

As a matter of fact, I do not suppose the Secretary of the Treasury will to any material extent personally participate in the investigations and the findings of this committee. The committee will have to deal with the thousands and tens of thousands of cases that would come before it from every quarter of the country, and it would be impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the great and burdensome duties imposed upon him, to give very much time to these investigations. He would not do it. These questions would be heard and determined and settled by the other four members of that committee.

Can we not trust this committee of five men? They will be prominent and distinguished citizens, three of them members of the Federal Reserve Board, who have already shown themselves eminently worthy of the confidence of their countrymen, and the high positions they now occupy certify to their integrity and to their ability and to the confidence of the people of this country in them. I do not believe we need to fear that these gentlemen will be guilty of any act of favoritism or that they will discharge their duty with any purpose whatsoever except the accomplishment of the essential purpose of the legislation itself which is to conserve the capital of the country for financing the Government, our allies, and the industries whose operations are necessary and contributory to the war.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate discussing the question of whether there ought not to be some governmental authority to regulate and reasonably control the investment of money in things unnecessary to be done during this war; in the production of things which do not contribute to the winning of the war. I think, while there may be objection on the part of some to it for one reason or another, it may reasonably be assumed that the country and the Congress are agreed that that is necessary at this time; at least I do not care further to discuss that question. That was not the purpose of my taking the floor; it was only an incidental statement in connection with the argument that I propose making.

The issue that I understand is presented at this time is whether the capital issue committee which the Secretary of the Treasury has established shall remain a voluntary committee, performing only the functions and duties now imposed upon it by the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, or whether it shall be made an official body, with the sanction and the authority of law behind it. That I understand to be the issue.

I want to say generally that while I think the present arrangement has been to a very considerable extent effective, I do not believe that it has resulted in that full and complete conservation of capital which is to be desired. I believe that it will add very much to the effectiveness of this committee in the accomplishment of the purpose we have in view if it is made a legal body.

Now, as to the powers that should be conferred upon it, that is, of course, a matter for the Senate to consider and determine; but I think we would be shortsighted if we should not invest this committee with great authority, which it now has.

I assume the Secretary of the Treasury would not have asked for this legislation if he had not thought to accomplish the purpose of its creation it should not be confined simply to investigation, suggestion, and advice. The alleged sufficiency of an advisory committee in England does not imply that a committee of similar character and power would be effective in this country.

There are other circumstances that differentiate that case from ours. England is relatively a small country. As I understand, the whole banking business of England is controlled by about 40 great banking corporations, all dominated by the Bank of England, the fiscal agent of the Government. In this country we have thousands of independent banking institutions scattered over a territory many, many times greater than that of Great Britain, and a system that might be effective where the whole financial system of the country is controlled by only 40 banks could not reasonably be expected to be as effective in a country with many thousand banks, some under Federal and some under State control, and without centralized control.

I do not wish to pursue that branch of this matter further. It is said that section 8, which imposes penalties for the violation of the decrees, rules, and regulations of the proposed capital issues committee, should be stricken out, because it is said that we ought not to impose penalties for the disregard of the actions of any agency of the Government; that penalties ought to be imposed only for violations of legislative enactments; that penalties ought not to be imposed for the violation of any action of a department or of any rules or regulations of a department of this Government; that the proposition contained in this section is a monstrous proposition; that it is an unconstitutional proposition; that it is one never heard of before; and it is one hardly worthy of an autocracy, much less of a republic.

Mr. President, even in peace times Congress has often expressly provided that a violation of the rules and regulations of departmental bureaus should be punished by fine or imprisonment. That was no new thing when this war began. But this is not the first time that we have indulged in legislation of this character since the war began. Some time ago we created a Food Conservation Commission. What is the object of that commission? In principle it is the same as sought in the creation of the proposed capital issue committee. This country was confronted by the menace of a food shortage. It was held to be absolutely essential, to enable us to supply our own demands and the demands of our allies for food, that in some way or other we should conserve our food supply and production by minimizing the food consumption of the country. If it was necessary to adopt drastic action in order to conserve food to supply our allies as well as ourselves, is it any the less necessary to adopt drastic action in order to conserve the finances of the country, in order that we may finance ourselves and our allies in the war?

In the food-control act we invested that administrator with broad authority to issue licenses to regulate the public and the private business of the citizens of the country.

This was denounced at the time as monstrous. Well, in peace times it would have been monstrous. Unless it had been absolutely necessary to accomplish a great and essential purpose it would have been monstrous. I voted for it reluctantly. I would not have voted for it had I not thought the exigencies of the situation made it imperatively necessary.

Mr. President, the same is true with reference to our coal situation. We not only had to supply the ordinary demands of this country for coal, but we had to supply the great industrial plants and factories required to supply the abnormal demand of this country and our allies in part with coal for the manufacture of munitions and other war materials. In order to conserve our coal supply for these essential purposes, we invested the Fuel Administrator with powers absolutely autocratic; with powers that nobody in his senses in this country would have consented to unless he had been convinced that it was imperatively necessary in the public interest. We gave him sweeping powers. We provided severe penalties in each of these enactments for the violations of the licenses, rules, and regulations established by the administrators of these functions. Indeed, Mr. President, I think it will be admitted now that if we had not provided these penalties and put them behind the action of the Food Control Commission and of the Fuel Control Commission, regulatory efforts in these behalves would have been largely nugatory and ineffective.

Under ordinary circumstances it would be clearly unconstitutional, whether it was connected with the production, use, and sale of food and the production of coal, this fixing of the price at which these things should be sold and bought and these penalties for the violation of administrative regulation with respect thereto would, under ordinary circumstances and except in those of war, have been clearly unconstitutional, clearly monstrous, clearly not to be thought of. But, Mr. President, we did it, and we did it because we thought nothing else would meet the situation; and I think now everybody will agree that nothing less drastic would have met the situation.

The point I wish to impress upon Senators is that we are doing in the part of the bill under discussion nothing that is more violative of ordinary principles of republican government, nothing that is more violative of the rights of the individual citizen or the individual business man, nothing that is more violative of the principles of our constitutional government, than was done in connection with these other two commissions which we established. I wish to further emphasize the statement that in the situation which confronts us every man who gives proper consideration to these matters must reach the conclusion that it is just as essential for this Government at this time to conserve its money supply and to see to it that that money is not dissipated in unnecessary expenditures, but that it performs the service which the public interest requires that it should perform in this great emergency, as it is to conserve our food supply and our fuel supply.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. In 1914 cotton was 6 cents a pound. Cotton closed yesterday at 33.6 cents, an advance of more than 500 per cent. The war can not be carried on without it. Will the Senator include cotton in the list of regulations?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not discussing the articles that ought to be included. I am willing to include anything and everything that the judgment of this Congress and the judgment of the people of this Nation shall determine it is necessary to include in order to win this war.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the majority of the Senate, then, to bring that question before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a question which can be taken up later if the Senator from Illinois desires to take it up. It has no relevancy to the question I am now discussing.

Mr. President, the question is, If it is necessary to do these things in order to conserve the capital of the country, shall we refuse to confer upon the body which we create to perform the duties incident to doing these things the power to enforce its decisions and decrees?

I know it is said that this section is drastic. I do not hesitate to say that I question the expediency of prescribing the penalty; but I think there ought to be some penalty, otherwise the effectiveness of the enactment may be seriously weakened and impaired. Whether it ought to extend to the regulation and rules established by the committee or not is, I concede, debatable. In my judgment I repeat, however, that it is important to the efficient operation of the system that we are about to create that there should be some penalty imposed upon a willful disregard of the action and the findings of the committee.

The Senate will deal with that question as it sees fit. I have no pride of opinion, and I am sure the members of the committee have none in the matter.

Mr. President, I did not rise with any view to entering into quite such an extended discussion of these matters as I have indulged in and I will not trespass further upon the time of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has been recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think this bill is of the utmost importance, and I am very anxious for its speedy passage.

The conditions created by the war have, of course, disturbed all the financial conditions of the country. That is inevitable. The enormous loans which the Government is required to place, the enormous taxes which it is required to collect have shaken our financial fabric. Perhaps the most important single thing for the successful prosecution of this war is the placing of the great Government loans. We have placed several billions. We are going to place many billions more. The result of this preemption of the loan market by the Government is that securities, no matter how good and how safe they may be, have no market at anything approaching their real value. Selling them back and forth to each other does not help us at all, and we have no foreign market to sell them in.

Mr. President, it was perfectly clear to me, and I think to others, that something would have to be done to enlarge credits. We were drifting straight toward a financial crash, in my opinion. We have this next loan coming. The ordinary savings of the people from month to month probably will not be sufficient. As the law now stands, it is impossible to borrow on collateral from the Federal reserve banks. It was of vital importance to enlarge the opportunity for borrowing on collateral. That will enable people to put up as collateral good securities which they will otherwise have to sell at an enormous sacrifice. That is provided for by this bill. A man desirous of investing in a Government loan can take securities to a member bank and get the money, and the member bank can then go to the financial corporation and borrow the money, and on the notes of the corporation can secure money from the Federal reserve bank. In other words, the bill enlarges the opportunity to borrow money on collateral, and I think that is an absolutely vital thing to do. I think we must have it.

The bill also provides methods of relieving the savings banks. If we have to raise the rate of interest—as we are very likely to do—on the next Government loan, you may have a run on the savings banks, and, their assets not being liquid assets, you might bring on a business panic which would not only cause enormous losses everywhere, but which would shatter all prospects of a successful placing of the loan. There are some fourteen billions in the savings banks. I think the same thing applies to the insurance companies, which are all operated under careful laws of States. There must be an opportunity for such institutions to get relief in order to guard against a widespread business panic. The same thing is true of the public utilities. They are obliged in this year to renew $225,000,000 of securities.

They are all under State laws. Their rates are fixed. Their wages and their expenses have increased enormously. Their rates must be and will be, no doubt, advanced by the action of the States; but that is a slow process and the crisis will not wait. Their earning capacity does not justify a bank in advancing money to them on their security. We should precipitate a panic if we allowed the public utilities of this country to fail and go generally into the hands of receivers. It is not a question whether they are contributory to war work; it is a question of public interest, of maintaining their credit, of enabling them to go on. That is provided for in this bill. Provision is made that they can get money through financial corporations. I mention those points as showing the immense importance of passing this bill.

Now, I come, Mr. President, to sections 7 and 8. They never had my approval. Not that I am against licensing; on the contrary, I think that we must take some method of preventing improvident issues of new capital. That must be done. It has been done by every nation at war. They have a committee now in the Treasury which is approving or disapproving new issues of capital, and which has worked very well. It is a strong committee and its work is good. Necessarily this must be done, and it has been done by every other nation; but in England, at least, compliance with the action of the committee is voluntary. Now, this is an effective method. It has proved to be effective in other countries and it has been effective here.

Let me give an illustration to show how perfectly well it works. We can pass no law that will prevent a State or a municipality from issuing a loan. We can not interfere with them by law. The municipality or the State can sell its bonds over its own counter and we can not prevent it; and yet the voluntary committee in England has reduced municipal loans and municipal demands for new capital to £6,000—practically to nothing.

I know cases where this committee now in operation at the Treasury has stopped a loan of one municipality simply by refusing its approval, and has cut another down. Those must be voluntary, and there is more danger of the improvident use and improvident demand for new capital for municipalities than in any other single direction.

The voluntary system has worked in England and has worked perfectly well with municipalities. The fact is that investors generally and those who lend money will not lend money to enterprises and will not take securities which the board in Washington declares to be adverse to the public interest, and you must put it on that broad ground.

It was proposed, as the bill originally stood, to give the directors of the corporation the power to issue or to withhold licenses and then put a penitentiary penalty on anybody who undertook to act without a license. It seemed to me that this was one of the errors of which too much of our legislation has been guilty, and which arises from basing the legislation on the action, or the probable action, of a very small minority of people instead of basing it on the attitude and the action of the great majority of the people. I believe it is a vicious principle to pass drastic legislation in order to reach a small and inconsiderable minority of people who are not ready to do their patriotic duty, and thereby to punish and interfere with and harass the great body of patriotic citizens who ask nothing better than to help the Government in every possible way.

I think, Mr. President, that the purpose, the importance of which I fully recognize, can be entirely attained by a committee which can only reach voluntary compliance. As I have said, it has worked perfectly in England, and, so far as we have tried it, it has worked here.

The committee felt that in any event the question of licensing ought to be trusted to the Reserve Board, who are already dealing with it, who have better sources of information than the new corporation could possibly acquire in a short time. We framed the amendment creating this committee on capital issues which appears in the italics on page 14, and it received an overwhelming majority of the committee as a substitute for leaving the licensing in the hands of the directors of the financial corporations.

Mr. President, I am personally opposed to section 8. I think it is a dangerous provision. I am not going to discuss the constitutional question. I do not think that is a point which has much effect upon anybody's mind at this moment. But putting that aside, admitting that it is constitutional, I think it is extremely dangerous to give into the hands of any board or commission the power to send an American citizen to the penitentiary because, in the judgment of that board, the loan that he is asking for is not in the public interest. Without their approval he never could get it, and to give this drastic authority to any board here seems to me not only needless but in the highest degree dangerous and likely to lead to great abuses.

I think section 8 ought to be stricken out. I think the prohibition which begins in line 24 of page 14 and runs down to line 10 on page 15 ought to come out. I have no objection to giving to the committee now operating a legal status and proper means and authority to carry on their work. I have no objection to that. I think there is this point also to be considered, that if we should strike out the committee altogether it might cripple and hamper the committee now existing. I am very firmly of the opinion that we need that committee; that we need the opportunity to stop improvident issues of new capital. Therefore I have no objection to leaving in those italics—that is, the amendment of the committee creating the committee on new issues—and I can not believe that the Treasury Department would have the slightest objection. They might think—I have no doubt they do think—that the present form is better, but I can not believe that they would seriously object to the Senate making this change. I am sure they can work under it, because they are working under it now, and I am sure also that the Secretary of the Treasury would feel as I feel, that the vital points of the bill, the great objects to be attained, are contained in the other clauses.

Those members of the committee who are opposed to these sections did not think it necessary to get up a minority report. They had no desire to break in that way, but they reserved the right to discuss and to oppose these two sections.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if he feels that there is no necessity for any penalty whatever for any violation of the act?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. Not merely a violation of these regulations or orders, but a willful violation of the act itself?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, the act itself is quite apart.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the order.

Mr. LODGE. I mean as far as licensing goes, I think there ought to be no penalty. I think it ought to be a voluntary compliance.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can see a distinction between a violation of the act and a violation of rules or regulations. There might be a violation of the act itself under the provisions of the law, as to which there should be some penalty.

Mr. LODGE. Of course section 8 includes the licenses and orders, and I want that out. I have no desire to leave out the other provisions of the act. I do not think that the other provisions need penal clauses.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will allow me, if section 7 is left in we do not need penal clauses.

Mr. LODGE. I think the penal clauses ought to go out.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question which I intended to ask the Senator from North Carolina. Is it not a question just when the operation of any industry will be contributory to the prosecution of the war? Might it not be said, in other words, that any enterprise or business on which the prosperity of a community is more or less dependent, at least indirectly, contributes to the prosecution of the war? Would you give to the committee the unlimited power conferred by the bill to prevent the issue or the sale of securities of such business or industry if it be lawful and the prosperity of the particular community in which it is situated is dependent upon that business or industry?

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator. That is one reason why I desire to get rid of the penal clauses. But I think that we can not afford to confine the action of the committee to acts contributory to the war. I think, for instance, as I have already said, that it is of immense importance to prevent the public utilities from failing and going into the hands of receivers in the course of the next six months. It is not because they carry men to the shipyards or do something directly contributory to the war, but because I think it is against public interest to allow such a blow to credit and finance as that would cause.

Mr. STERLING. I think of another illustration.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, if the words "important public interest" are left in then they have a right, of course, to approve loans of the character the Senator describes.

Mr. STERLING. It occurred to me that the bill should be so amended as to provide that this committee should not have the power to restrict the capital expenditures necessary for the proper maintenance or the safe development of any lawful business or that the committee should not have the power to prevent the issuance of municipal securities where the welfare of the inhabitants of a city or of a political subdivision of or a State, for example, were dependent upon the public improvements which could only be made upon the sale of such securities.

Mr. LODGE. There I am afraid I entirely differ from the Senator. I think nothing is more important than to have a committee which will have the power not to stop, they can not do that, but to disapprove municipal issues or bonds for a project that can perfectly well wait. The greatest waste of money necessary for the war will be in the municipal loans.

Mr. STERLING. But take the question of sewage for a city, take the question of waterworks for a city, the health and welfare of the people of that city are dependent upon the construction of the improvement.

Mr. LODGE. The committee can not stop it.

Mr. STERLING. It can stop the sale of bonds necessary to raise the money for the purpose of making the improvement.

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, I think the number of proper expenditures which it will stop will be very few, and I think it will stop millions which do not need to be expended now and which would not be expended if the municipalities were private corporations.

Mr. STERLING. It occurred to me that some amendment might be made that would guard that point.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator's amendment would nullify the whole thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say that this committee would hardly undertake to interfere with floating bonds for a sewage system of a city. Of course, it is possible to imagine their doing that, but it will never happen.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there was a case of a city that came before the new capital committee with a loan for a million and three-quarters. It was to be used for sewerage and lighting and improving the water supply. I think those were the principal items. The committee went over it very carefully with the representatives of the city, and they agreed that they did not need more than a million dollars at this time and they cut it down three-quarters of a million. I think that was a distinct benefit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In other words, all that was necessary for their present necessities and health could be accomplished by a a million dollars.

Mr LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr WILLIAMS. The balance was just for the purpose probably of encouraging real estate speculation.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I think our attention was called to a case where a large appropriation had been made for the building of a magnificent school house, and after the committee consulted with the officials of the city it was decided that they could wait until after the close of the war.

Mr. LODGE. Building courthouses and everything of that sort. We shall stop our public-building expenditures, as we ought to do, and if we can do it the cities can.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me further, we have the assurance, which we all rely upon, that in determining whether or not aid shall be given to public utilities at various times a wise discrimination should be exercised.

Mr. LODGE. No doubt.

Mr. GALLINGER. Where some might feel it ought to be helped a great many might feel that it ought not to be helped.

Mr. LODGE. And a much wiser discrimination than if they had the power to put a man in the penitentiary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I doubt the efficiency of the operation of this act if we are going to trust entirely to the voluntary compliance of citizens. I do not see the force of the argument by analogy with what is taking place in Great Britain. England is a tight little island; it is a very small country. The people in England who are engaged in large commercial, industrial, and bank enterprises are either personally, or almost personally, acquainted and intimate with one another. The consequence is that there is a degree of elbow touch, a degree of confidence in the men when they are selected for a committee which can trust to nothing except voluntary compliance with its advice that can not exist in a country of 100,000,000 people divided into different sections, industrially, commercially, and otherwise. There are no men who can be selected in America who can engage the absolute business confidence of the people upon the Pacific slope and the Gulf coast and the Atlantic coast and the Middle States and the Mississippi Valley, while a committee in Great Britain could very easily obtain the absolute trust and confidence of all the business enterprises of Great Britain.

It would be much easier to find somebody who could work a system depending entirely upon voluntary compliance, even in the great State of New York, than to find one who could work the same system all over the United States, having to rely upon voluntary compliance in Mississippi, South Dakota, Vermont, Texas, Louisiana, Washington, Arizona, and the balance of this country; in other words, this is not, and it never was in the consolidated sense, just one nation. It is a Republic of republics; and there exists, and there always will exist, a diversity of sectional interests—I do not mean in the political sense, of course, but in the industrial and commercial sense—that never can be avoided so long as the country is as big as it is, and diversities will grow in number as the country grows in population.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there is no division in this body about our duty to contribute in every way toward success in the great struggle that confronts our country. We should be ready to make every sacrifice that is necessary as a Nation and as individuals, and I believe we will make them. This does not mean that every suggested piece of legislation is wise or that every objection to a suggested piece of legislation is wise. It is our duty, with the earnest purpose of finding out what is best, to confer and express in legislation our conviction of what will really serve our country, and I am sure that we shall do so.

With regard to the control of bond issues, we all understand the great task that confronts our country in financing the war. We know that it is the duty of the States, of municipalities, and of individuals to refrain from unnecessarily seeking to occupy the bond market and to refrain from unnecessarily placing a call upon the labor forces of the country for work not required. I believe it most important that there should be a national agency to consider and to act upon bond issues. We have had a voluntary agency of that sort. So far as I have learned no organization has disregarded the recommendations of that agency. When we add to that voluntary agency the sanction of Federal indorsement and make it a governmental agency, I do not believe there is a State or a municipality in this country which would disregard its recommendations; I do not believe there is any large organization that would seek to do so; and if either did, I do not believe the bonds would be salable.

You create a Government agency to pass upon this problem, and the first question that a bond buyer would ask would be, "Has your issue met the approval of the Government agency? If not, why not?" I am most heartily in favor of a Government agency to pass upon such issues, because I do believe it essential and helpful in the struggle we are conducting.

So far as section 8 is concerned, I have regarded it as almost immaterial. Even without it I do not believe that any bonds can move, unless approved by the Government board; I do not believe the penalty will stop bonds seeking to move, because, the issue having been disapproved by the Government agency, I hardly think it possible that any municipality or State would seek to put bonds upon the market.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GRONNA. Will it disturb the Senator from Georgia if I ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. GRONNA. I have in mind a condition which actually exists in my State. We were unfortunate enough not to have raised a very good crop there last year, and our farmers do not have their own seed grain. Our legislature has passed an act authorizing the counties to issue bonds to cover the situation, and many of the counties will issue bonds to the amount of $300,000. The result of the proceeds of the sale of those bonds will, of course, all be new capital; it will not be for the purpose of redeeming outstanding bonds. I desire to ask the Senator his opinion——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. About such a bond issue as that?

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to ask whether, in the Senator's opinion, under this bill which we are now considering, if enacted into law, there would be a possibility of stopping a bond issue for the purpose which I have stated?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would regard a member of a board who would stop such a bond issue in the aid of food production and of agriculture as being almost subject to impeachment; such action would be so stupidly ignorant.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Georgia say that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would be my view as to such action on the part of any board.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator from Georgia think that such a member of a board would be subject to an inquiry as to his sanity rather than to impeachment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think St. Elizabeth's Asylum for the Insane would at least be a proper place to send such a member.

Mr. McCUMBER. We especially need food; that is one of the things which we have declared are necessary for the success of the war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think in such a case the board ought to say: "You are doing a necessary work in the effort to stimulate food production; we believe you are carrying a necessary burden, and we thank you for it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Georgia places that construction upon the language, or I am glad to have it explained in that way, because this bond issue, of course, will be for production for the purpose of carrying on the war, and for nothing else.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill as it first came to us provided that the new board of directors of this war finance corporation should pass upon this question. After considering the subject, we concluded that we had an organization which was already known to the public and which enjoyed the popular confidence—the Federal Reserve Board—and that it would be better to place this power there than to say that it should go into the hands of men who were as yet unknown. How did we do it? Discussing it with members of the Federal Reserve Board, they advised us that their work was laborious and that they would be glad to have two additional outsiders to help them; to take the majority of this new organization from the Federal Reserve Board, and to give them two outside men to do the detail work for them, to make the investigations for them, and they would come in to help decide, after those men had carried a good deal of the detail work.

As a result of our conference we made the board consist of five members, three from the Federal Reserve Board and two to be selected by the Federal Reserve Board to help the three do the work. I think it was a wise determination; I think it will work splendidly.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned I am indifferent about section 8. Generally speaking, I do not like that kind of legislation. I do not think it will do any harm, because I think the good will be done without it; and I do not think it will do any harm to strike it out, because I think the good will still be accomplished without it.

I believe this discussion has been valuable; I believe in the advantage of conference and short discussion upon the floor of the Senate when Senators are present and listen and when time is not uselessly consumed. I think we have made progress; I think we are all reaching the conclusion that section 8 is not as harmful as many have thought, because it is not so important as they have thought; and it is not as necessary as some have thought, because section 7 will accomplish the result, even if we do not have section 8.

Mr. HARDING and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I do not suppose, Mr. President, there are any infallible Government agencies, though I have a strong notion that, if there are such, they ought to be attached to the Treasury Department. A village banker came into my office this morning and told me one of the discouraging experiences of a citizen who wished patriotically to contribute to the financing of the Government's needs. He had just laid aside a communication from the Treasury Department urging his bank to invest the allotted percentage of its resources in war certificates, when a depositor of his bank came in to get his advice about the proposed withdrawal of a time deposit amounting, let us say, to $20,000. That would be a very considerable deposit in a village bank. The banker very properly called attention to the need of the Government and the problem of the banks in meeting Government requirements, and suggested that the time deposit be left in the possession of the bank. Whereupon the depositor drew from her pocket a prospectus of a stock issue of a very notable concern in this country offering a preferred stock bearing an 8 per cent dividend rate, and said, "I prefer to withdraw my money and invest in this 8 per cent proposition because it likewise is a Government need." When the banker expressed surprise thereat, his attention was called to an indorsement on the prospectus signed by a member of the Federal commission which passes upon such matters, saying that this industry was essential to the Government in war and, by imputation at least, had the sanction of the voluntary committee which recommends securities. But for the intervention and explanation of the banker that depositor would have undoubtedly invested her entire resources in this proposed issue of preferred stock; and I may say, knowing the broadening industry as I do, and knowing its high character as I do, that its additional financing at this time is no more essential to the prosecution of the war than my enlistment in the aviation service is necessary to the prosecution of the war.

So, Mr. President, I find myself in a strange conflict of opinion. I think the licensing feature of this bill is calculated to accomplish a very great good, because if there is any one thing needed in the United States of America to-day it is a deterrent on expenditures; but, on the other hand, I could no more vote for the licensing feature proposed in this bill than I could vote at the same time to discontinue our part in the war. Therefore I find myself a great deal embarrassed.

I suppose I might preface these few remarks by a rather unusual admission in the Senate, namely, that I do not know very much about big finance, but some of us have qualities of instinct, if nothing else, and I confess I am unable to bring myself to give assent or approval to the pending measure. To begin with, it is premised on a false assumption. The bill starts out by saying it is for the purpose of financing industries connected with the war. I doubt very much if there is a Senator on this floor who does not know that every industry necessarily connected with the prosecution of the war is financed by the department with which it operates, if such financing is necessary.

The Shipping Board has indulged in a system of financing that in ordinary times would drive a sober financier to drink; the War Department has been financing industries connected with munitions in a manner so liberal that it could not enlist approval were not the necessities of the Government so urgent, and the Navy Department has likewise been extending its funds to necessary industries, so that everything directly or indirectly connected with the war has the Government's financial aid at this time.

That is even true of the farmer who is seeking to raise the necessary food for the conduct of the war. Then, if you will pass on to the great railroad interests of the country, they have already been taken under the wing of the Government, and if I read correctly the railway-control bill recently passed and now in conference, every railroad security in this country is cared for by that measure. So if you look over the field of Government financing I know of nothing remaining of a serious character, except the Government's sale of its own securities.

Let me say, however, lest I be misunderstood, that I am not unaware of the fact that there are securities of public utilities and great solvent corporate industries in this country which are maturing from month to month and which it is essential should in some way be cared for, but I was rather agreeable to the comment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day, when he said that solvent institutions of that character could usually pretty well care for themselves. Nevertheless, I think, Mr. President and Senators, there is necessary some agency to help the financial institutions of this country to meet the obligations of many great and important operations, and I think that there must be a practical way of doing so without the enactment of this bill.

I am conscious that one who opposes a proposition without offering a substitute is in a more or less indefensible position; but I have a very strong conviction, Senators, that it would be a very simple matter to modify the banking act, under which this country finances its operations, so as to meet the requirements of the present situation.

I know of no way whereby you can create wealth with the wave of a magician's wand. I can see nothing in this bill that is going to create four billions of additional wealth in the United States of America, and I do know that if the assets of public-utility corporations and other institutions that are to benefit by the enactment of this measure are worth what they purport to be, it ought to be a very simple matter to provide a plan whereby the Federal reserve bank can issue currency on those assets.

Mr. President, I apprehend that one of the great difficulties of the situation is the drain on the financial world by the issue of our bonds. I think that is true, and my complaint is that we are not doing all that we ought to relieve that situation.

If it will not seem lacking in respect by one on the Hill for those in authority at the other end of the Avenue, I want to put in the RECORD at this moment the statement that there has been appeal after appeal for this body to modify the existing revenue measure so that the banks of this country can meet the drain due to the excess-profits and income war taxes and pay them without exhausting their reserves; and there has been insistent objection at the other end of the Avenue, and it has been impossible to secure any action on the part of the Congress. And yet, Mr. President, to illustrate, the payment of the taxes under the new revenue law in the industrial sections of this country, under the provisions of the law, by the 30th day of next June, will wipe out essentially every dollar of the reserves in the banks of the State of Ohio

Under such circumstances, it is very easy to see that a new bond issue will fail to go "over the top," as they have heretofore, because the banks have not the resources; no matter how patriotic the banks and their depositors may be, because the drain for the time being is on their resources to meet the current tax demands. I am not sure that an extension of the time of payment, providing for the acceptance of partial tenders, would wholly relieve the situation, but my judgment is that it would go a long way in that direction; and since there are so many Members of Congress asking for that modification, I should like to speak for a moment for a little coordination between the executive and the legislative branches of the Government to meet a very necessary situation; and we might very reasonably, Senators, meet this financial situation by a little further coordination in seeing how much we can save from expenditure instead of trying to see how much we can spend.

I think, Mr. President, that I know something about the temper of the country. I think we have gone war mad. I think it is important that somebody shall begin to think soberly, and try to get this country's hat on straight; we need some sane thinking. Why, out in my State the other day they put over a county ditch improvement which requires the expenditure of $190,000, which the proponents had been urging for seven or eight years, and the common sense of the situation was against the improvement; and only a few days ago they put it over in the name of war, because they were going to reclaim land to raise food to feed ourselves and our allies. Yet the improvement can not be completed inside of three years, and, if my recollection is good, it takes a few months after that to raise a crop!

I do not know how closely some of you have been watching the proceedings, but up in the Committee on Commerce there have been some manifestations of this tendency to expenditure that would prove a national farce if it were not so serious. There are dreamers sitting about the committee room, wanting the sanction of our committee, who want to build ships for the Government, who have not yet even acquired a hammer for driving a rivet; and they want the Government to buy the yards and construct the ways and furnish them the materials and spend without limit when the most optimistic of them could not promise you the delivery of a ship short of 18 months ahead.

Quite apart from that, Mr. President, one Senator on this floor, and a number of Members of Congress, and particularly the distinguished Postmaster General—who does not know one-tenth as much about the telephone business as I do—propose with a wave of the hand to take over the District telephone system. Somebody else—somebody of very great eminence—wants to buy the docks and wharves of an enemy in the harbor of New York. Well, Mr. President, we have the use of them now. Then, what in the name of sense is there to justify an expenditure of countless millions when we are worrying ourselves gray about how we are going to raise the money? Does it not seem sensible that in this hour of peril and anxiety and extraordinary need somebody might cry out against countless expenditures and commit this Government to the use of available funds for the requisite needs of the prosecution of the war?

I am not in agreement with my distinguished friend, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] about the railroad policy for this country, and I think it is very inopportune to press the issue in this trying moment; and yet, Mr. President and Senators, the process of scrambling the railroad eggs is being so vigorously pushed forward right now that I will stake my reputation as a prophet, poor as it may be, that the unscrambling will never take place in the United States of America. I do not want anybody to misconstrue my remarks as meaning that I am committed to that policy, but I can read the signs of the times, and one of the difficulties of the United States of America to-day is that everybody is seeking to work his reformation in the name of war.

Why, Mr. President, I have been visited by seemingly countless charming women interested in the suffrage proposition who have repeated again and again and again that the grant of suffrage to women is a war measure, when I think my understanding of history is that noble womanhood, from the dawn of civilization, has been making her sacrifices and contributions to the onward movement in both war and peace without any thought heretofore of the suffrage opportunity. However, that is merely a remark in passing.

This is the thought that I have in mind: If this country, Mr. President, must commit itself to a financial policy that would not be tolerated for five seconds in a time of peace, in order to enlist the patriotic devotion of the financiers of this land, and if this country must do all that is asked for in order to persuade the farmers of this country to raise food to support us during the war, and then if, added to that, this country must grant limitless compensation to the labor that is engaged in war enterprises, I would not give you very much for the patriotism that there is left to save the American Republic. If I could call, Mr. President, for the performance of that thing which is so needful at this moment, I would ask those in executive authority in this country to say not less to those of the world who are interested in this enterprise, but more to those of America who are directly concerned in our part in the war. I think it quite possible for the executive function to be so exercised that America will be just a little more harmoniously and enthusiastically committed to the war; and I think it will be possible, with the exercise of the proper authority already granted, to coordinate American activities into a more effective prosecution of the war.

Mr. President, I am sure I will sound no note which can be misconstrued to-day. I think such votes as I have cast in this body, and such utterances as I have ventured to make to the public, will afford me a guaranty against the charge of copperheadism, which is ever too ready to be uttered on the part of the "court journals" and some of the press critics in this country. I am just as much interested in the successful prosecution of this war as anybody connected with the Government or in the Army or Navy; and if you would let me enunciate the policy of the United States, I would say that we are committed to this war until Germany is brought to terms, or these United States are not worth residing in; and I am willing to vote for every measure that is necessary for the successful conduct of this war. I have surrendered my personal convictions time and time again; and I want to be counted as one of the Senators, "rubber stamp" or otherwise, ready to give sanction to the necessary measures for the successful conduct of the war. But, Mr. President, I reserve the right to exercise such little judgment as I possess concerning measures not directly concerned with the conduct of the war; and in my humble judgment the pending bill has infinitely more to do with the period after the war than it has to do with the successful financing of the war.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] asks me to explain the latter remark, but he is polite enough not to insist. I have no veiled thought. I have a profound conviction, Mr. President, that in the name of war efficiency we are completely undermining our form of government. I think the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who speaks with great earnestness and official inspiration and with complete understanding, made reference this morning to the autocratic administration of certain functions of government. I am not finding fault with that. If all these grants of autocratic power will only expire with the termination of the war, I shall have no great fear thereat. I hope we can always be sane and thoughtful enough to provide for the early expiration of such powers. But, Mr. President, since the Senator from North Dakota has ventured his inquiry in an aside, let me point out a danger in popular government.

It has not been demonstrated yet that popular government can survive. I hope it will; but the very weakness of it is that we yield to political and personal prejudices and have more concern about our own political careers than we have about the perpetuity of the Government. If I do not make myself clear on that point, let me say now that I am thinking more to-day about the future of the United States of America than I am about my own succession to the Senate. Some one high in authority has said that he was very anxious to know what the people were thinking about the firesides of America. I can say the people about the firesides of America are eager and anxious to mobilize the resources of this country to win the war, but they do not want to overturn our representative form of republican government to accomplish it. I say, with all due respect, that there has been a tendency since the beginning of this war to center in the Department of the Treasury an authority that is unthinkable; and I for one say now that the end has come to such proceedings for me.

When I say that I have no ill will, no unkind criticism, for the distinguished gentleman who holds the portfolio of Secretary of the Treasury. He may be infallible, for all I know; I will assume that he is invulnerable; but we used to have a saying when I was a lad about the impropriety of riding a willing horse to death; and I do not think the Senate ought to impose upon any one American, great as he may be, so many responsibilities in these hours of peril.

Mr. President, I said a moment ago we should be stronger if we cried out against abnormal and endangering expenditures in this hour of peril. Let us wait upon the reform that calls for countless millions of Government money until we can act affirmatively in the deliberations of peace. Let us not buy everything that somebody has a grudge against in order to satisfy the man with the grudge. Let us not assume to reach into this mysterious Treasury with its seemingly inexhaustible fund and take under the Government wing that activity in our daily affairs which somebody wants brought under the wing for selfish purposes—not altogether, of course. Let us not assume that here in Washington is some vein that reaches into a mysterious supply of gold that no profligacy can exhaust, and let us assume that you can try the patience of the country with shocking expenditures and extraordinary obligations.

Mr. President, I am not petty about these things. If I were to choose a classification I would rather be a spender than otherwise when the means are available, but here is the richest Nation in the world; here is a Nation with more gold than any other in the world; here is a Nation with more resources than any other in the world; and we find ourselves unconsciously admitting in the United States Senate that rich as we are and late as we were in entering the war, we are harassed to finance our operations, while the central powers of Europe, with scarcely more than 40 per cent of our possession in gold, are able to carry on their operations without any manifestations of deep concern. I am not so self-satisfied, Mr. President, but what I can say, if it is demonstrated to me that our policy is wrong and somebody else's is supreme, we might well pattern after the other fellow whose supremacy is proven.

At any rate, in this financial proposition, if the United States of America, with Great Britain and France, can not evolve a successful plan of financing the war, in my judgment the war is in a very serious way. I am not willing to confess American weariness over the task we have assumed. Of course, the world grows weary of any great work, but any weariness manifested in the United States of America must be psychological, because the American heart is strong and weariness does not indicate unwillingness to complete a task. But let us not add to the concern of the country by these perfectly abnormal financial operations.

Mr. President, I said a little while ago in these rambling remarks that I recognize the need of some sort of governmental assistance in meeting the maturing obligations of many public utility corporations and possibly some private enterprises other than those in the public service. It is easily conceivable to me that if our Federal Reserve System is all that we have believed it to be, and I have taken occasion to commend it on all occasions, it would be a very simple matter to add to its authority in making available a currency through the assets in the securities of these institutions. A particularly appealing thing to me about it is that that process ought to be made effective without creating some enormous new department here at Washington.

Senators, without knowing precisely how far the need extends, I call your attention to the fact that we have made the Capital City of this country very much like a mining camp with a new discovery of gold, and Government employees are being brought into this great Capital City on every incoming train, and they are falling over each other; and the pity of it is that, however good the intent may be, the needed executive efficiency is lacking and we are spending millions on employees that ought never to be spent.

I venture to give you an illustration. Like many of you I went to a certain department of the Army only yesterday to do what all of you are called upon to do, to intercede for the recognition of a very worthy constituent in the matter of a military commission. In this particular instance I met one whom I look upon as the most courteous and considerate of division chiefs with whom I have come in contact in the activities incident to the war. He said, "My dear man, your case is hopeless, because I have discovered that there are 280 commissioned men waiting for assignment for whom there is not a single place open. I have myself within the last week removed many men from this department because there was nothing for them to do, and they were in the way of our efficient operation." That is an easily conceivable situation, resulting from feverish effort. We were unprepared, everybody was eager to do the most and best possible, and there was the call for every character for Government service, and essentially every element in our American life responded, to its credit. I am not finding fault with the Government employees who have come here; I am finding fault with the chiefs who employ them when they do not need them.

But they are not the only ones who are coming to Washington. Have you ever studied the personnel of a Pullman car of passengers coming into Washington? I have had occasion during the last few weeks to travel only a little bit; I assure you that it was no more than seemed necessary, to me at least. If you will take note of the average Pullman car of pilgrims to Washington, you will find that three out of every four of them are talking money, money, money. I will not say that it is all without patriotism, nor do I wish anyone to think that I am referring solely to profiteering. We hear much about profiteering. Let me put into the RECORD that profiteering is personal; it does not belong to any particular class; but thousands headed for Washington seemingly have some design on the Treasury, not an unlawful one, not always an unpatriotic one. But I would like to see the thing, Mr. President and Senators, that would bring a halt to the notion that this struggle of the Republic is a scramble for gold.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). Will the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator to be expressing the view that four-fifths of the people of the United States who come to Washington come actuated by a desire to get next to the Treasury?

Mr. HARDING. I distinctly said the opposite. I said that four-fifths of the people who come to Washington are talking money, but I expressly said that many of them come with high motives and patriotic motives, and I supplemented it by the statement that profiteering is purely a personal matter.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator did not desire to have the inference drawn that these people who were talking money were not talking in a proper way?

Mr. HARDING. The Senator can make such inferences as he desires. I am sure he will not think that I am indicting everybody in this country, nor am I indicting everybody who comes to Washington.

Mr. BORAH. That is the reason why I asked the Senator the question. I think when the Senator comes to look over his remarks he will see that that would be the inference which his remarks would naturally sustain.

Mr. HARDING. I thank the Senator. If that is his impression, I am sure that any impression which he has would be the natural impression of a person of intelligence.

Mr. THOMAS. Has the Senator studied the psychology of the passengers on the Pullman trains leaving Washington?

Mr. HARDING. I think if I did I would find that instead of discussing the subject of money they would be discussing the question of credit.

Mr. THOMAS. It seems to me that if they had put up at any of our Washington hotels they would be very apt to be discussing the absence of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDING. I can understand the point the Senator makes without having been called upon myself to stop at hotels here.

Mr. President, I had not thought to detain the Senate this long, and I have regretted that I have been unable to offer the specific substitute for the pending measure which will accomplish the things that I would like to have accomplished.

I want to revert again to the fact that I think some repressive measure which will stop unjustified and unjustifiable expenditure at this particular time would be a very helpful thing to the country. Yet I understand the motives and the feelings of the man who wants his particular enterprise to go on just as it has heretofore. The man who builds highways, who paves the streets, wants the customary bond issue because he can thereby continue his operations. But the man who thinks about the public which pays for those operations might well advise the public to wait, because the cost at this time is double the normal figure, and it is a very unwise proposition that we should go on with these expenditures not absolutely essential at a time of abnormal cost.

Yet, Mr. President, when I think of the power that would be lodged in the license committee, the thing is so abhorrent to me that I want it known I can not vote for such a measure. Nevertheless, I can see there might and ought to be some instrumentality which would perform this needed function without the menace that comes from such a grant of power.

Of course, it is very difficult to bring men who have large operations in various lines to an understanding that they must make some sacrifices for this war. I tell you, Senators, the people of America have never at any time come to an understanding of the seriousness of this war. They have not to this day.

When I hear representatives of the agricultural world saying that farmers are mad, and they will not put out crops as they did last year because they are not satisfied with the compensation they received, I reflect that surely no one who speaks for the patriotism of the agricultural world would make such a remark if he understood the seriousness of the war situation, and the radicals of the labor world must have called to their attention the crisis of the situation and the extreme need of their patriotic participation if we are going to reach a position where we would avoid the conflicts that the unheeding unfailingly brings on. Capital, for whom much has been said in this body, surely has not come to any understanding of the seriousness of this tremendous world conflict, else capital would bend itself voluntarily to the restrictions of capital issues and the conservation of reserves of the banks and the available funds of this country to finance the necessary issues of bonds to carry on the war.

While I am addressing the chairman of the Committee on Finance, I invite his cooperation in relieving the situation that is attending the required payment of the war taxes of this country by the 30th day of June. Let us see if we can not do a little cooperation and coordination, not to relieve the burden of the taxes, and not to relieve the taxpayer himself, but to relieve the banks in meeting the requirements of the taxpayers.

Mr. President, it has been a very difficult thing for a good many people in this country to understand the difficulties of meeting the war taxes which we imposed. I can say to you that there are many concerns called upon to pay more in war taxes in 1918 than they ever had cash on hand in their corporate or individual business existence, and that brings a very heavy burden upon the banks of the country, and for the banks, not the taxpayers, I suggest that this body ought to persuade the Secretary of the Treasury to consent to an extension and partial-payment plan which will relieve that situation.

Of course all taxpayers must expect some hardships, and you may as well preach the doctrine now. Business is going to have its hardships, and new undertakings not urgently demanded for public good may well stand aside. We ought to enunciate the doctrine this day that the dreamers and schemers and promoters must momentarily pass out of activity in American life.

You can not do things, Mr. President, with Government money with any propriety in 1918 which will bear no fruit in adding to our war strength until 1920 or 1921. That would be the most inexcusable policy that anyone could suggest. Yet my attention has been called again and again to men who are seeking Government financial aid in undertaking enterprises that could not accomplish one useful thing until 1920 to add to our strength in war. I will give you an illustration. The distinguished Senator who is presiding at this moment [Mr. NELSON in the chair] has been in attendance upon the session of the Committee on Commerce. There have come the advocates of the Government's building steel barges and towing tugs to establish new lines of inland waterway traffic, feasible enough no doubt, but it would require not less than three years to put such an agency into effective operation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I am not interrupting the Senator, I hope he will revise that statement. There is not a particle of evidence, and I have been over the plans and figures. A very material addition can be made to the transportation facilities of the country within the next six months.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Missouri and I can have no disagreement about the possibility of developing an effective agency of Government service on our waterways, but we can not agree on his statement that it can be accomplished in six months. If I had my way, there would be no expended energies in that direction as an essential war measure.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does the last statement of the Senator imply that the Government has already entered upon that activity?

Mr. HARDING. I think the Government has already entered upon that activity, but not with any knowledge of mine as to a specific authority so to do.

Mr. KING. I was going to ask the Senator by what authority had it so entered upon that work, which agency of the Government had undertaken it, and where was the appropriation for it.

Mr. HARDING. I assume it is within the particularly broad powers of the Shipping Board on one hand, which are ample to cover almost any undertaking. There has been something done toward the construction of barges for inland-waterway service, and it may have gone so far as to provide for the towing tugs. Just where the Government control of railways comes in I am not yet aware, but I think there would be no question about the authority of the Shipping Board to supply such agencies of commerce.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. HARDING. Does the Senator wish me to yield further?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I only want to direct the Senator's attention to the statement he made and to which I understand he substantially adheres. I am very sorry that he does.

Mr. HARDING. There can be no serious controversy between the Senator and myself on that question. I think it is the most feasible and practical thing in the world for the development of inland-waterway service in cooperation with the Government control of railways, but I can not agree that it can be accomplished in 1918, and I would not, if I had the say, divert one ounce of energy needed in other lines to the undertaking of such an enterprise at this time.

Mr. REED. I am glad to know that the Senator at heart is in favor of the proposition, and I think at the proper time I shall be able to show that he is mistaken as to the length of time.

Mr. HARDING. That may be a matter of judgment.

Mr. President, the Senator's interruption and the trend of the colloquy has called to my mind the very argument I want to emphasize on this floor. I want the resources and the granted authority given by Congress to the executive departments to be concentrated on efficiency for the successful conduct of the war. I call the attention of the Senate to what, to my mind, is a very important manifestation of the failure in that direction. We are crying in this country for ships, ships, more ships, to meet the shipping situation. Do you not think, Senators, that while we are struggling for a great accomplishment in that direction it would be worth while to centralize somebody's attention on getting efficiency out of the ships we have? I think it will do no harm to say so, because Germany knows it a good deal better than the people of the United States, that we have been so unable to adjust ourselves to efficient activities that our ships to-day are employing 70 days in a round trip between the American ports and the ports we use on the other side of the Atlantic, while an efficiently loaded and unloaded ship ought to make the round trip in 35 days. What is the result? We are losing just half of American efficiency and effectiveness, because we have not yet learned how to do things, or we have been lacking in devoting the administrative attention to a problem that ought to be solved if America is to win the war. And it must be won! It is just as important to handle the ships you have effectively as it is to make a heroic struggle to secure more ships.

This is the point I am trying to make, Mr. President, that in the creation of new commissions and undertakings, new adventures and experiments, we are dividing our forces instead of concentrating them. I am speaking at this moment for the policy of centralization of authority in finance, and to put into the hands of the Federal Reserve Board the problem of meeting the needs of the capitalistic interests in this country in serving during the war.

Senators, that seems to me a simple proposition, and I think there is no lacking in respect for administrative or executive authority if this body should exercise its judgment and apply some different remedy than that which came from the department, and put upon one of the Government agencies already established the problem of meeting this more or less difficult situation.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I want to be known as favoring any needed financial operation for the successful conduct of the war, but I am not in favor of a proposition which will fasten itself upon the country and put the capital of this country along with that of many of our industries and the railroads in the hands of a Government department. Let us have a system of individual operation such as that which made us what we are, and a committal on all sides to the problem which the country has on hand, and I have a conviction that we can solve it.

Mr. SWANSON obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understand the pending motion is one which I offered to strike out section 8 of the bill. At the time I made that motion I stated, in substance, that I expected also to offer a motion to strike out section 7. There has been considerable debate upon the motion I made and upon the whole question as to whether section 7 ought to remain in the bill. As a result there have been conferences and talks among Senators and others, and I think a satisfactory adjustment has been arrived at, or at least one which will be satisfactory to a number of us who have been vigorously opposing the retention of the licensing clause; and the criminal penalty as it is in the bill is applied to violations of orders of the board. As a result of all this, I think a situation has been worked out which will be presented, I understand, in a motion by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. In order that that motion may have the right of way, I desire to now withdraw the pending motion.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there has been a great deal of discussion in the Senate regarding section 7 and there has been a great division of sentiment regarding its provisions. Most Senators and the country at large, I think, have been very desirous of giving authority to some one to regulate the issuance of securities. The Government now must have a monopoly as to the borrowing of money if it is to float the bonds which are necessary to the successful conduct of this war. Consequently there must necessarily be some control of the issuance of securities. There has been some debate and a division of opinion as to what extent this authority should be given. Some are in favor of a very severe regulation in licensing bond issues, while others have thought this provision went too far. The various Members with various views have consulted with some of those who are to be responsible for the administration of the law, and I think most of them have reached the conclusion which is embodied in the substitute which I am about to offer for section 7 and also for section 8, after the substitute for section 7 has been voted on. I now send to the desk and ask to have read the substitute to the pending bill, which I offer for section 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 7 and to insert in lieu thereof:

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war and providing for the public security and defense through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital issues committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board. Such committee may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate, pass upon, and determine whether or not the sale or offering for sale or for subscription of any issue or any part of any issue of securities hereafter issued, the par or face value of which issue shall be in excess of $100,000, is compatible with the public interest. The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the compensation of the several members of such committee who are not members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be $7,500 per annum, to be paid by the corporation. Shares of stock of any corporation or association without nominal or par value shall, for the purpose of this act, be deemed to be of the par value of $100 each. Nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to borrowing by any person, firm, corporation, or association in the ordinary course of business as distinguished from borrowing for capital purposes. This section shall not be construed to apply to any securities issued by any railroad corporation the property of which may be in the possession and control of the President of the United States. Nothing done or omitted by such committee hereunder shall be construed as carrying the approval of such committee, or of the United States, of the legality, validity, or worth of any securities.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Virginia a question on that point?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that the original bill had no provision to limit renewals; in other words, if securities fell due there was nothing in the original bill to prevent the corporation from renewing its existing issues. If this amendment is adopted as it is read from the desk, does it affect the provision of the original bill in reference to renewals?

Mr. SWANSON. Not at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The opportunity for the renewal of bonds falling due is still granted, and there would be no control of that?

Mr. SWANSON. There is no alteration of the bill, as I understand, in reference to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there is.

Mr. SWANSON. To what extent?

Mr. SMOOT. As I recall—I have not had a chance to read the amendment now offered—I believe that the amendment which the committee agreed to, preventing the retroactive part of the amendment as originally written, does not appear in this amendment as I heard it read.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand this amendment——

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Utah is right about that. It does not appear.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that ought to be inserted.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that. I think it ought to be inserted. It is intended to make the issues of new securities subject to the moral effect of the approval or disapproval of the proposed committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was not criticizing the Senator's amendment as it stands, but I do think it is of the utmost importance that there should be nothing in this bill to prevent any man who has already issued bonds and whose bonds are falling due having the right, without going to the Government to ask permission, to renew his bonds if he can do so.

Mr. SWANSON. Without this approval or disapproval?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Without approval or disapproval.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that. I think that ought to be included.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to say to the Senator from Virginia, who answered the inquiry of the Senator from Alabama and stated that there was nothing in the bill that would prevent a refunding or a reissue of outstanding bonds, that I do not think he is correct about that. It seems to me that the language on page 14, where it states that "no person, firm, corporation, or association "——

Mr. OWEN. But, I will say to the Senator from Connecticut, that language goes out.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator stated that there was nothing in the original bill that would prevent the reissue. This would prevent the reissue if it stands, in my opinion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I certainly would want this amendment agreed to:

Issues of shares or securities heretofore made, only a part of which have been sold or disposed of prior to the approval of this act, shall not be affected hereby.

Mr. SWANSON. I think that ought to be included.

Mr. SMOOT. That certainly ought to be included in this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Virginia if he does not think the substitute which he has offered ought to be printed, so that we may have an opportunity to read it before it is acted upon?

Mr. SWANSON. I will say that if the Senator from North Carolina desires this bill to go over, and does not want to put it through earlier—I would largely defer to him and to his wishes in that respect——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think, as the amendment is very short, it could be printed in half an hour at the Government Printing Office and sent right up here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In addition to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], there should be added "nor shall this act apply to issues of bonds made for the purpose of meeting maturing securities."

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that I think that they would not be affected under the amendment, as I caught its meaning from the reading at the desk.

Mr. SWANSON. The amendment, as I understand, entirely eliminates the issuance of any license.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I am inclined to think that this amendment, so far as the question we are now discussing is concerned, is not very different from that amendment. It reads: "Or offering for sale or for subscription, of any issue or any part of any issue of securities hereafter issued." So it does not apply to securities heretofore issued.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I do not think that covers the case, because it, at least, might be construed, and probably would be so construed, when you say "securities hereafter issued," to mean securities issued hereafter, not the indebtedness. What I am speaking to is securities issued for the refunding of existing indebtedness.

Mr. SIMMONS. That could be met by simply adding the words "and shall not apply to renewals."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that would be satisfactory.

Mr. SWANSON. I think that ought to be included; and I will accept that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Insert "shall not apply to renewals."

Mr. SWANSON. I will do so.

Replying to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I will say that this amendment, as I understand, was prepared by gentlemen who had differences and divisions of opinion. I was with them when they prepared and went over it. As I understand it, it eliminates from section 7 the issuance of licenses, and allows this board to pass upon new issues, to give its moral support for their approval or its moral support in disapproval of the issues of new securities. That is the main feature of the amendment.

Section 8 contains the penalties applying to violations of the act, but the penalties do not apply to violations of the rules and regulations promulgated by this board. I have not had an opportunity to study it so thoroughly as I should like to have done, but that is practically the change which is made in this provision of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, what attracted my attention was that apparently the committee having this bill in charge has abdicated its functions, and a Senator not a member of the committee offers an amendment that some of us, at any rate, have not seen. I think we ought to have opportunity to examine it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I did not offer this amendment until I had seen Senators who had been antagonizing section 7 and section 8 and also the Senator who is chairman of the committee; and I would not have offered the amendment except with the approval of these gentlemen. The chairman of the committee can, of course, speak for himself as to how he feels in regard to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not offer my suggestion as a criticism; but the circumstance I have indicated attracted my attention; that is all. I have been very strongly opposed to section 8 and have had very grave doubt as to the propriety of section 7. I did not expect to be consulted, of course, in any unusual way; but I should like to know exactly what change has been made. The proposed substitute has been amended already three times on the floor, the Senator offering it having accepted three proposed amendments. I think the Senator's amendment is a very great improvement over the original bill as it came from the committee, but whether or not it meets the objection that some of us have is a matter of doubt in my mind because I have not had an opportunity to examine it; that is all.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield first to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I understand, the substitute proposed by the Senator from Virginia does not change the amendment reported by the committee in any particular except that it eliminates the prohibitory power of the committee and strikes out the licensing provision and substitutes for those two provisions an authorization to do the very things, and the only things, which the present voluntary committee is now doing, namely, it provides that this committee shall investigate all applications for new issues, pass upon them, and determine whether they are compatible with the public interest. All it does in effect is——

Mr. STONE. At that point will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. STONE. He says that this committee shall investigate all new offerings appearing.

Mr. SIMMONS. Under rules and regulations to be established; yes.

Mr. STONE. Is there any provision in this amendment that requires new offerings of securities to be submitted to the committee before they are presented to the public?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it is not mandatory; it is merely intended to require the things to be done that are now being done by the voluntary committee. The language is as follows:

> Such committee may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate, pass upon, and determine whether or not the sale or offering for sale or for subscription of any issue or any part of any issue of securities hereafter issued, the par or face value of which issue shall be in excess of $100,000, is compatible with the public interest.

Mr. STONE. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, with the view of getting a consistent provision in the bill relating to this subject, I will ask this question: Suppose a corporation in some part of the country desires to offer its bonds or securities in any form for sale to the public without consulting this committee, as evidently the corporation would not be obliged to do, and the officers of the corporation should go to New York or Chicago, or wherever it might be, and put their securities on the market—what I wish to know is how would this committee pass upon such securities? How would they know about them unless they should be brought to them? The law if passed in this form would not require that they should be submitted to the committee; it would be a voluntary act; but suppose the corporation offering these securities does not care to submit them to the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, neither is there at present any regulation or law requiring anybody to present his application to the committee now existing under the Treasury Department. They have the power, though, by rules and regulations, to require that to be done; but whether that be done or not, in the condition of the market it is believed that, in the main, nobody who does not do that can be able to float securities.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to say, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a moment. The proposed substitute preserves the present voluntary system which obtains in this country and largely in all the other countries at war. It does nothing more, however, in that respect than what is being done now through the voluntary committee, except that it makes that committee an official body; it gives their action the color, at least, of official action. In the main, the principle of voluntary action on the part of those who wish to float securities will be continued, but with the certainty that if institutions desiring to issue new securities refuse, in compliance with the rules and regulations of this committee, to submit their application to the committee, the banks of the country and the investors of the country will probably not be disposed to invest in their securities. The strength of the system will depend upon its persuasiveness, and its persuasiveness will grow out of the fact that those who do not comply with the rules and regulations of the committee in this respect will probably not be able to sell their securities. That is what I understand the amendment is.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, in addition to that, I will say to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that the committee can be active or inactive, as the public interest may dictate it to be. If conditions are such that they do not see fit to approve or disapprove of securities, the committee may permit securities to be sold without their approval or disapproval, as I understand the proposed substitute; but if they see that the time has come when the issuance of private securities is interfering with the sale of Government bonds or other vital interests of the Nation, the committee, on its own motion, may pass upon any securities offered and give its approval or disapproval, according as the public interest may require. As I understand, the amendment leaves it largely for the committee to determine to what extent its approval or disapproval is necessary in the public interest.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think it can be stated in a nutshell that all it does is simply to continue the present capital-issues committee and to make that committee an official body instead of an unofficial body, as it is now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me ask——

Mr. SIMMONS. I say that is all it does.

Mr. KING. I was just about to propound a question, with the Senator's permission. I was not here when the amendment was offered, and I was about to ask the question whether or not it provides that this committee may promulgate rules the violation of which will be attended by any penalty?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it does not.

Mr. KING. What would be the penalty if the committee refused consent to the issue of certain securities and the securities were issued notwithstanding their disapproval?

Mr. SIMMONS. The only penalty would be that in that case the parties interested would not be able to float their securities on the market.

Mr. KING. They might attempt to do so, though.

Mr. SIMMONS. They might attempt to do so.

Mr. KING. But they would have the opposition of this organization?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator allow me to finish a brief statement I want to make?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator had concluded. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, this substitute is familiar to me; I have examined it very carefully, and I wish to say to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who is an honored member of the Finance Committee, that I called a meeting of the committee this morning. The Senator came into the room, but for some reason had to retire before we took up the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I had an appointment to meet with the Committee on Appropriations at that very hour; and so I could not remain.

Mr. SIMMONS. I merely make this statement because the Senator seemed to think that he had not been consulted about this matter at all. I presented the substance of this proposed substitute to the committee this morning, and it was discussed in the committee, but the Senator was not present.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, it is proper that I should say that I inquired of one or two Members of the Finance Committee after the committee adjourned and they said nothing had been done.

Mr. SIMMONS. We took no action about it, I am going to state that; we discussed it, and, therefore, the purpose of the substitute was known to the members of the committee who were present, and would have been made known to the Senator from New Hampshire if he had found it convenient to remain in the committee. I merely make the statement so that the Senator may not think he has been disregarded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not at all sensitive on that matter or any other; it is all right so far as offering the amendment is concerned. My only anxiety was to be granted the privilege of examining it; that is all; looking it over cooly and calmly, and seeing exactly what it contemplates. I think it is better than the original provision of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. The main controversy, Mr. President, about this matter has been not with regard to the necessity of some such authority as this, but, in the first place, as to whether this committee should be a voluntary committee such as now exists in the Treasury Department, or a legal body; and, in the second place, whether its power over securities should be of a prohibitory character or whether it should be given merely the power to investigate and to express an opinion to the investing public of the country as to whether proposed issues would be in the interest of the country or against the interest of the country under present conditions.

This substitute creates the committee and gives to it an official status, but does not give it the power of prohibiting issues that may come under its ban. It merely gives it the power, after investigation, of advising the public, for such consideration as the investing public may see fit to give its advice, as to whether, in its judgment, it would be compatible with the public interest to have the new securities thrown upon the market.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Suppose that the parties desiring to issue securities should proceed to place their bonds or other obligations on the market in the face of the advice of the committee, there would be no penalty attached to that action, would there?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no penalty attached in the proposed substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. There is no penalty; they can proceed to try to place the securities if they so desire; but, of course, they will have to do so in the face of the judgment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is provided section 8 is stricken out of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. What is now proposed, as I understand, is to so provide that the decision of the committee shall have a moral effect.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. And if the parties issuing the securities violate the rules laid down by the committee no penalty will attach; but, of course, they can not violate the act without becoming subject to the penalties?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is right.

Now, Mr. President, I understand that the substitute for section 7 is to be followed by the Senator from Virginia offering a substitute for section 8. The substitute which he will offer, as I understand, to section 8 will practically retain the present section 8, except it will eliminate from it the penalty that it would impose upon the violation of the orders, rules, and regulations of the committee.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is correct. If the amendment I have already offered is adopted, then I will follow it with an amendment proposing a substitute for section 8.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has indicated, at the meeting of the committee this morning there was no action about this matter, and I am not, therefore, authorized to accept this amendment on behalf of the committee. I wish to say though for myself personally that I shall under the circumstances feel constrained to give my support to this substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Virginia has offered his amendment, or whether he has simply sent it to the desk with a notice that he would offer it at the proper time?

Mr. SWANSON. I have offered it, and it has been read. It is offered as a substitute for section 7.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is, then, the pending amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been offered and is pending.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, just a minute before the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] offers the amendment that he proposes. I desire to say a word about the pending amendment, and it is this:

If this capital issues committee is to be appointed with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, which means that nobody can get on it that he does not O. K. and does not have confidence in, and if it is to consist of three members of the Federal Reserve Board, who are certainly experts on financial matters, and two other members, to be chosen by the Federal Reserve Board, who will be likewise experts—if you appoint this special capital issues committee of five financial experts, why is it necessary to fetter that commission by placing it under the thumb of the Secretary of the Treasury at every point? He is there at its birth; he is one of the creators of it, the approver of it, and the organizer of it; and yet the bill in its language, as well as the language of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, inhibits this committee even from proceeding to investigate a case except subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. In other words, we have a Secretary of the Treasury who manages the whole Treasury of the United States, who is in the same person the Government director of all the railroads of the United States, who is the head of several other great war activities, and now we propose to place this specially created committee of experts right under his thumb and give him the veto power over its every act and breath during its whole existence. What is the sense of it?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. The rules and regulations are all that are to have the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the amendment itself is now in the possession of the Senator from New Hampshire, and it is the only copy that I know of; but I clearly understood from the reading from the desk that this committee could, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate any application for the issuing of bonds, and I submit that it gets on my nerves to set up a Pooh-Bah, no matter how able he may be, and make him the head of every function of governmental activity during this war. I do not care what party he belongs to, or what his motive may be, it is not right, and if this committee is worthy of any existence at all it ought to have an independent existence the same as any other self-respecting committee.

Mr. REED and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the language of which the Senator speaks is the language which is now in the bill. It has not been changed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I know that.

Mr. REED. The part of the bill which I now read, and which is repeated in the amendment, is repeated without change until I shall indicate:

That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital issues committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board—

A change occurs there, the word "which" being made to read "such committee," which is purely a matter of language and not of difference of idea—such committee may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it—with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury—

It reads—

under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate, pass on, and determine whether or not—

Such securities are compatible with the public interest. As I understand that—and I confess that its meaning depends somewhat on the punctuation—the committee makes its own rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and then it proceeds to investigate and pass upon public securities.

While I have the floor, if I may—I think I am trespassing on the good nature of the Senator from Utah, and will yield if he desires.

Mr. SMOOT. No; go on.

Mr. REED. If you have the bill before you, you will notice that the licensing clause which follows in the bill is stricken out in the amendment. It is omitted altogether; that is, this part is omitted:

Such committee shall, however, grant licenses for any such sale, or any such offering for sale or for subscription, which it shall determine to be consistent with the foregoing purposes.

That is taken out. Then we come to the language of the bill again:

The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the compensation of the several members of such committee who are not members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be $7,500 per annum, to be paid by the corporation.

That is likewise taken from the body of the bill. Now, if Senators are interested, I will proceed just a word further.

There follows in the amendment this language, which is taken from the bill, which is found a little further on:

Shares of stock of any corporation or any association without nominal or par value shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to be of the par value of $100 each.

That is a clause that is lifted from another part of the language.

Nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to borrowing by any person, firm, corporation, or association in the ordinary course of business as distinguished from borrowing for capital purposes.

That language is lifted out of the section a little further on, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has proposed an amendment to include——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Since the Senator has just read it, if he will permit me to do so, I will read the amendment that I desire to offer following that language:

Nor shall it apply to borrowing to renew or refund indebtedness existing at the time of the approval of the act.

Mr. REED. The next language that we find in here is:

This section shall not be construed to apply to any securities issued by any railroad corporation the property of which may be in the possession and control of the President of the United States.

That language is also taken from the bill.

Nothing done or omitted by such committee hereunder shall be construed as carrying the approval of such committee, or of the United States, of the legality, validity, or worth of any securities.

That is taken from the bill. So that, speaking broadly now, the change in section 7 amounts to this: The licensing power is taken away, and any penalties that are prescribed in the bill are taken away, but the committee is given a legal status, and is authorized to pass upon securities. If it does pass upon securities, there is no penalty going with it, except that it is deemed that if this committee declares that the security is inimical to the public interest it will practically destroy the market for that security, and at least it will assure it of no reception by any of the national banks or by this corporation.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood the Senator from Missouri to state that the penalty clause was eliminated. Does the Senator mean all penalty clauses or just those in reference to violations of rules and regulations issued by the committee?

Mr. REED. I am coming now to answer that.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED. As the bill is presented now, with section 8 amended as it is proposed to amend it, the only penalty clause that is left is a penalty for violating the act; and from reading the bill I confess I can not see where that would apply except possibly to an officer of the corporation who loaned money in violation of the provisions of the act.

Mr. STONE. That is about all there is to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no doubt but that this amendment is a wonderful improvement over section 7 as reported to the Senate. In effect, it is the voluntary system for which some of us contended yesterday. If I had my way I would strike out section 7 entirely and allow the present committee appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to pass upon all these issues for the future. I believe the result of it would be all that we could hope for. I do not believe there will be one thing gained by adopting this provision, with the single exception that the committee will have a legislative standing.

I want to predict now, however, that if the substitute is adopted it will result in the building up of a new bureau, with new offices, hundreds of employees, and the expense will be many, many times greater than if administered by the three members of the Federal Reserve Board under the system now in operation; but of course the expenditure of a few hundred thousand dollars or a few million dollars makes no difference in these days of extravagance and as long as it will give employment to five hundred or a thousand more men or women.

Mr. President, I think there is something in what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] called attention to; and I intended asking the Senator offering the amendment if he would not agree to one amendment to his proposed substitute by striking out the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury" in the second paragraph of the substitute. It occurs at two other places in the substitute; but I really believe that if we are going to give the committee any power whatever, and if it is to be a committee in very deed, then we ought to strike out the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury" as found in the second paragraph of the substitute.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know whether it has occurred to the Senator or not, but it seems to me that it is a matter of very great importance that this committee in its work should articulate, so to speak, with the Federal reserve bank and with this finance corporation. They are all necessary factors in accomplishing the purpose which we have in view.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator perfectly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Secretary of the Treasury is ex officio a member of the Federal Reserve System and of the finance corporation, and he is the responsible head in all the financing by the Government of this situation; and this committee ought to articulate with both of the two bodies through which this financing is to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I agree thoroughly with the Senator. I believe they ought to articulate and cooperate in all the actions affecting future issues, and therefore I am not asking that the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury" shall be omitted in the appointment of the board. They have got to be appointed by and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I think that is right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator whether it would not be better to let the appointment be without the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but to have the rules and regulations subject to his approval? Then the appointment would be entirely independent.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I think it ought to be just the reverse.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator from Utah think that in these important matters it might be better to have the President approve, rather than the Secretary of the Treasury?

What the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] said in reference to the Secretary of the Treasury appeals very strongly to me. I had marked my bill to move amendments striking out those words in every instance in the original bill. Now, here even the term of office of the members of this board is to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. It seems to me that that is a function which the President might better exercise than the Secretary of the Treasury; and by so providing we would get rid of the duplication of language that puts this matter practically in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury in every instance.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason why I thought I would not move to strike out the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury respecting the terms during which the several members of the committee shall serve was this: The members of the Federal Reserve Board appoint these other two members. The President does not appoint as members of this committee the members of the Federal Reserve Board. The act itself provides for that, and it provides that the Federal Reserve Board shall make the appointment of the other two members; and I thought perhaps it would be well enough to say that the board appointing them should do so with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GALLINGER. Might it not be better for Congress to determine the length of service?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that would be better, Mr. President; but when it comes to the question of authorizing this committee to investigate and to pass upon and determine whether or not there shall be sold or offered for sale or for subscription any issue or any part of any issue of securities hereafter made, I think that ought to be wholly within the power of the committee, not with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Not only that——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SMOOT. I know what the Senator from Virginia is going to say. He is going to say that the rules and regulations are to be made with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. But what difference is there? If the board can not make rules and regulations according to its views to investigate as to these issues, the board can not really pass upon them, unless the Secretary approves.

In the other places where this language occurs in the substitute I can not see any good reason why it should not be, but in this case it does seem to me that the board ought to have full power, because, in the first place, they are appointed by and with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. No member of the board can be appointed unless the Secretary approves it, but after they are appointed it seems to me that they ought to have the power to investigate all issues and pass upon them without reference to the Secretary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator on yesterday was contending that the present voluntary system was all that was necessary, and he was perfectly willing that that should be continued.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; as against section 7 of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator know that all the rules and regulations under which the present committee is operating must have the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, the law does not say so, and there is no provision that they shall be subject to his approval. It may be true that that is the practice, and I will say to the Senator that perhaps it is the practice; but we have not so stated in the law.

But why put it in this bill, when there is no necessity for it? I do not think there ought to be a provision that could bring about a conflict between the Secretary of the Treasury and the board which is to investigate these issues. I think we ought to say that the board shall have the right to investigate and pass upon these issues, irrespecive of what the Secretary or anybody else says.

If the words were taken out as suggested by me, the amendment would read as follows:

Such committee may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it from time to time, investigate, pass upon, and determine whether or not the sale or offering for sale or for subscription of any issue or any part of any issue of securities hereafter issued, the par or face value of which issue shall be in excess of $100,000, is compatible with the public interest.

Mr. President, I do not desire to take the time of the Senate further on this matter; but while I am on my feet I want to offer the following amendment to the substitute. After the word "interest," insert "issues of shares or securities heretofore made, only a part of which have been sold or disposed of prior to the approval of this act, shall not be affected hereby."

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a provision in the present bill that is omitted from the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is a provision that the Senate committee agreed to and reported to the Senate, and it follows in this substitute the same place that it followed in the original committee amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I will accept that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia accepts the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment, as he has a right to do. The Secretary will state the pending amendment as it will read with the incorporation of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. After the word "interest," about halfway in the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia, insert:

Issues of shares or securities heretofore made, only a part of which have been sold or disposed of prior to the approval of this act, shall not be affected thereby.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah will be incorporated as a part of the original amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I offer as an amendment in the eighth line from the bottom of the page, just before the period in the center of the line, the following:

Nor shall it apply to borrowing to renew or refund indebtedness existing at the time of the approval of this act.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I will accept that amendment. That is included in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia accepts the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. The Secretary will state it in connection with his amendment.

The SECRETARY. To come after the word "purposes" and before the period, the Senator from Georgia offers the following:

Nor shall it apply to borrowing to renew or refund indebtedness existing at the time of the approval of this act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the matter is in such shape that the Secretary can state the amendment as it is now before the Senate, I should like very much to have that done.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, does the Senator want the amendment stated now?

Mr. GALLINGER. It ought to be stated at some time.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think it ought to be stated before we vote on it, and probably immediately before we vote on it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will withhold that suggestion until the Senator from Georgia has spoken.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not expect to detain the Senate for more than a moment. I think the time has come when we all understand this proposition and are prepared to vote on it. So far as I am concerned, I have been prepared to vote on it for some time.

I think the amendment is a very great improvement over the text of the original bill. It meets, to some extent, two of the most serious of the objections I pointed out on last Friday to this bill. There ought not to be any censorship of business in this country. The power ought not to exist anywhere, in anybody. to say that a man shall not lend to anybody his own money if he wants to, or give to anybody his own money if he wants to give it, or spend his own money in any way he wants to spend it; and the Senate will be going a long way whenever it occupies any such position as that, either in time of war or in time of peace.

But, Mr. President, while it is true that this amendment will remove the one most objectionable feature of the bill—namely, the licensing system—and will give to this capital issues committee only the same status that it occupies now, except, possibly, that it will give it legal recognition and probably will be the occasion for spending a little more money; while that is true, it is perfectly apparent now, as it has been all the time, that with these things taken out of the bill, all in the world that we needed was a few simple, common-sense amendments to the banking law. That is what we ought to have had.

So that I can not support the bill, even with the amendments, although the amendments proposed by my friend from Virginia along the lines of the suggestions of a good many opponents of this bill during the progress of the debate are acceptable and, I think, in one way or another remove some of the objections to the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I believe the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia is the best present solution of the problem. I shall support the amendment heartily. I do believe it is necessary to have some control over the capital issues in this country, but any control of that sort may be objectionable; it may be abused. We have practically the same control now. That has gone along unofficially. I have not heard any particular complaint that it has been abused. Congress will probably be in session during the most of this year, and if it is abused or if more authority is needed, more can be granted.

I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to one verbal error in his amendment, as it strikes me. The last sentance reads:

Nothing done or omitted by such committee hereunder shall be construed as carrying the approval of such committee or of the United States of the legality, validity—

And so forth. I think it should read "the approval by such committee or by the United States."

Mr. SWANSON. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "approval," insert the word "by," and, in the same line, after "or," strike out "of" and insert "by," so as to read: "by such committee or by the United States."

Mr. SWANSON. I accept those amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will make the modification in the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the amendment read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 7 as amended insert the following:

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital issues committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board. Such committee may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate, pass upon, and determine whether or not the sale or offering for sale or for subscription, of any issue or any part of any issue of securities hereafter issued, the par or face value of which issue shall be in excess of $100,000, is compatible with the public interest. Issues of shares or securities heretofore made, only a part of which have been sold or disposed of prior to the approval of this act, shall not be affected thereby. The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the compensation of the several members of such committee who are not members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be $7,500 per annum, to be paid by the corporation. Shares of stock of any corporation or association without nominal or par value shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to be of the par value of $100 each. Nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to borrowing by any person, firm, corporation, or association, in the ordinary course of business as distinguished from borrowing for capital purposes, nor shall it apply to borrowing to renew or refund indebtedness existing at the time of the approval of this act. This section shall not be construed to apply to any securities issued by any railroad corporation, the property of which may be in the possession and control of the President of the United States. Nothing done or omitted by such committee hereunder shall be construed as carrying the approval by such committee, or by the United States, or the legality, validity, or worth of any securities.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber for a short time and I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether or not during my absence the chairman, on behalf of the committee or on behalf of himself, accepted the amendment proposed?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that I have not accepted it on behalf of the committee, but I have stated that while I had no authority to do that and did not do it, personally I am disposed to support the substitute.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we had before us members of the Federal banking board, also the Secretary of the Treasury, who very strongly supported all the provisions of the bill which was reported, and at that time deemed those essential for the proper working out of this scheme of protection to the industries, financial and otherwise, of the country. May I ask the chairman whether or not he has received any word from the Secretary of the Treasury indicating any change of his position on that subject?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have been advised by the Secretary of the Treasury that he would greatly prefer the amendment drawn and reported by the committee, but the Secretary does not feel that the substitute would be seriously objectionable.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that information was given directly to the chairman.

Mr. SIMMONS. That statement was made to me by the Secretary over the telephone, and I had that statement from Senators who have conferred with the Secretary.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for a question.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator feel that we should get the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury for legislation in this Chamber?

Mr. McCUMBER. I was wondering why it was necessary to get the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury also to make an amendment after it came into the Senate. I confess I am a little bit puzzled, possibly because the committee included myself as not having been sufficiently disciplined to follow even our chairman in all the suggestions which have been made here.

Mr. President, every objection was fully discussed in the committee that has been made upon the Senate floor. I did not agree to every one of the provisions of the bill, but I did feel that when we came back into the Chamber with the bill the chairman ought not to carry under his coat a white flag that might be displayed whenever opposition seemed to grow in the Senate. It seems to me that before we abandon a bill entirely we ought at least to have a vote upon the particular sections which the committee as a whole have reported.

There are several other provisions of the bill that do not strike me favorably. I objected, for instance, as strongly as I could to paying a $12,000 salary to the other persons who are to be placed upon the board. I do not wish to urge it in the Senate, because I did not make a minority report. If the Secretary of the Treasury desires it to be $12,000, I do not suppose my voice as a legislator could go very far, even in the Senate of the United States. I simply regret the position we are placed in in reporting a bill practically unanimously and then surrendering the principal features upon the floor without even a vote.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia to section 8 is immediately connected with the amendment as a substitute for section 7. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia whether in his opinion the penal section applies to the authority granted to the board which is to investigate the new issue of capital?

Mr. SWANSON. I have not offered an amendment to section 8, which is the penal section.

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator was going to offer it.

Mr. SWANSON. My understanding is that the substitute amendment for section 8 will not apply to the violation of any rule or regulation of any department. It applies to a violation of the specific act itself.

Mr. LODGE. Would it apply to the determination reached by section 7?

Mr. SWANSON. It would not, I think. I understand it applies simply to a violation specifically of what is included in the act. It may in morals discountenance an issue of these securities, but section 8, as proposed to be amended by me, would not apply to it.

Mr. LODGE. My understanding is that the amendment offered as a substitute for section 8——

Mr. SWANSON. I have not offered it.

Mr. LODGE. I know, but it will be offered—I understand it provides for any violation of the act. The act confers upon the board power to pass upon, investigate, and determine. Suppose they determine that an issue of bonds laid before it is not for the public interest and the people who desire to issue those bonds go on and make the attempt to place them, do they come under that punitive section?

Mr. SWANSON. They would not, because that is entirely voluntary, and there is nothing to prohibit them. All that is done in section 7 is to get a moral approval or disapproval of the issue.

Mr. REED. The Senator is of the opinion that section 8 as it is about to be offered would apply a criminal penalty only to some act that is expressly prohibited by the statute we are about to pass. That is to say, if we find in the statute a command that officers of a corporation shall do a certain thing in a certain way and they should do it in a different way they might come within this penalty.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the Senator's attention to a specific instance where it will apply. The Senator will note the language on page 5, "no director or officer of the corporation shall in any manner participate in the determination of any question affecting his personal interests," and so forth. It would apply in a case of that kind.

Mr. REED. It will apply there, and it would probably apply if the officers of a corporation were to advance more than 75 per cent of the market value of the securities, and do it willfully. I am speaking now of the class that do not come within 100 per cent. Do I understand that the Senator from Virginia who offers the amendment agrees that the provisions of section 8 would not apply to a citizen who had asked to have securities approved and they had been disapproved, or who was handling securities that had been disapproved by the board and condemned as incompatible with the public interest? There is nothing in the criminal penalty that would apply to that citizen if he thereafter undertook to sell or otherwise handle those securities. That is the position of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SWANSON. I fully concur with the Senator in that contention, because in order to have the penalty applied the man must violate a provision of the act. There is nothing in the act or in section 7 offered forbidding it. If they make rules and regulations, the penalty would not apply to it.

Mr. LODGE. I asked the question because I wanted to be very sure that it was understood in that way. Sometimes, not always, the court will look at what was said in Congress in order to gather the intent of Congress in interpreting an act, and I wanted to make of record the intent as I understand.

Mr. REED. I desire to concur in the construction that has been placed upon the language and to concur in it with the express purpose manifested by the Senator from Massachusetts to the end that there shall never be any question hereafter as to the purpose of those who vote for the bill that it shall be limited to a violation of the act itself.

In this connection I call attention to another fact. It will be observed that we are striking out the language I quote now—

Or of any license, order, or of any rule, or regulation issued and duly published hereunder, or whoever shall willfully violate, neglect, or refuse to comply with any such license, order, or of any rule, or regulation issued and duly published hereunder.

Mr. LODGE. Those words go out, which I understand the Senator to read. It would be impossible to attempt to prosecute a man on the ground that he had violated a regulation or a rule.

Mr. REED. I think so. That is my opinion.

Mr. OWEN. That has been the understanding of those who have agreed on this measure.

Mr. LODGE. I thought it well to have it in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to inquire of the chairman of the committee or of the genial Senator from Virginia, who seems to have charge of the bill at the present moment, whether it is the intention to try to pass the bill to-day?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, with reference to what the Senator said about the Senator from Virginia, I assume it is the common practice in this body where a Senator offers a substitute that he has charge of it, for the purpose of accepting or rejecting an amendment to it. I have not interfered with the Senator from Virginia in the matter of his accepting amendments to his substitute. In reply to the Senator's inquiry as to whether we expect to pass the bill to-day, I wish to say to the Senator that I do sincerely hope we shall reach a vote this afternoon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will modify the question and ask the Senator from Virginia if it is his purpose to urge an immediate vote on his substitute.

Mr. SWANSON. I shall ask for an immediate vote upon it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I asked that question for this reason: If the bill is to be voted upon to-day, there will be no opportunity to make a critical examination of the substitute. If it is to go over until to-morrow, the substitute will appear in the RECORD and we would have an opportunity to give it careful consideration. If the bill is not to be voted upon to-day—and that is the purpose of my inquiry and it is a proper inquiry—there will be an opportunity, if this substitute should be agreed upon at the present time, to move to amend it in the Senate when the bill gets into the Senate; but if it is to be agreed to at the present time and the bill is to be passed to-day, there will be no such opportunity. I think we are entitled to that consideration and that we should have an opportunity to examine a substitute that is not in print, that is offered at a time when some of us had no knowledge of the fact that it was to be offered, and it is only a proper request that we should have a chance to examine it before the bill receives the approval of the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. The final disposition of the bill is left with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the chairman of the committee. I am anxious to have a vote on this amendment, but I will be controlled as to the time when a vote shall be had by the wishes of the Senator from North Carolina, who has charge of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while I am on my feet I want to express the hope that was mildly suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to-day that the time may come when the committees of this body will undertake to formulate bills, and not have them formulated at the other end of the Avenue and sent to us with an urgent demand that we shall enact them into law. I believe that if this bill had been framed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], as chairman of the Committee on Finance, or the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, we would have had very much less trouble than we have had in considering it during the last two or three days and it would have been a better bill, in my judgment.

We are told to-day that the Secretary of the Treasury has conferred with certain Senators and suggested certain amendments, and that the Secretary of the Treasury thinks we ought to pass this substitute. For my part I resent such interference. I think it is not right. I think we are abdicating our functions, and I earnestly believe that the time will come, and not in the distant future, either, when Congress will assert its right to frame its own bills and legislate in its own way, subject to the approval or disapproval of the President of the United States.

I repeat, Mr. President, I think we have a right to examine as critically as we may think proper the proposed substitute before we vote upon the final passage of the bill, and that is all I ask.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am exceedingly anxious that the bill should not be delayed. I think the public interest requires its speedy passage. We have now had it under consideration for nearly two weeks. The particular subject dealt with in the substitute is one that has been most thoroughly discussed in the Senate. We have spent several days discussing it, and it seems to me it is very easy to understand the changes that the substitute proposes to make in the amendment of the committee which we have spent so much time in discussing. I do not see that it is necessary to postpone action on the bill for a day on account of the substitute under the circumstances.

It has been very common in legislation here when a substitute has been offered which changes the text of the bill, if it is so complicated and so difficult that it takes a long time to understand what changes have been proposed in the substitute, that that is given as a reason why it should not be acted upon, but I do not think that that is this case.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to suggest to the Senator, since the Senator from New Hampshire only desires an opportunity if he finds it necessary to offer an amendment in the substitute after the bill passes from the Committee of the Whole, we might proceed with the matter up to the very point of the passage of the bill and then let it go over for the Senator from New Hampshire to have an opportunity to look at it. Then it would come up in the Senate to-morrow morning the first thing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would have no objection to that course, and I would have no objection if we could have a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the bill to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. So far as I am concerned, I would be very glad to agree to that, because I am quite as anxious as the Senator from North Carolina for this legislation. I believe it is absolutely necessary legislation in its broad features, but at the same time I do not think that we ought to rush it through to-day, especially in the face of a substitute which we have not seen in print.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is satisfactory to the Senate that we shall proceed with the consideration of the bill with the understanding that the final vote in the Senate will not be taken until to-morrow——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. That course will be satisfactory to me.

Now, Mr. President, let me, before I take my seat, make reference to some remarks somewhat personal to myself. I have followed very closely the proceedings of this body, and I think I am pretty familiar with the situation here. I recognize the fact, Mr. President, that legislation in this and every other legislative body in the world is very largely the result of compromise. For reasons that I think it unnecessary to go into I have had the view, and have had it for some time, certainly since early yesterday afternoon, that it would be necessary in some way to compromise this measure if we were to secure any legislation at all.

Before the Secretary of the Treasury had expressed an opinion about this matter my mind upon that question had been made up. I did not express a purpose to support this substitute because the Secretary of the Treasury approved it. I intend to support it because I approve of it as a compromise measure. I would prefer the amendment as reported by the committee, but as a matter of settlement and a satisfactory adjustment of this very much disputed question I am of the opinion, independently of the views of the Secretary of the Treasury about it, that the substitute ought to be adopted.

Mr. President, so far as the Finance Committee is concerned, it is the common practice in this body that members of a committee reporting a bill may exercise their judgment as to amendments or substitutes offered upon the floor of the Senate. I have not understood that a member of the committee was compelled to stand here and vote against his judgment upon a substitute or an amendment because it was in conflict with something the committee had reported. Members of the Finance Committee have risen on the floor of the Senate and asserted their independent right in this respect. It is a right that ought not to be abridged; it ought not to be challenged. I think that I as chairman and as every other chairman of a committee in this body have the same right in these respects as the members of the committee. It can not be that a member of a committee may exercise his judgment in the vote that he casts upon a substitute for an amendment of the committee and that the chairman of the committee can not do the same thing. I understand that he is limited in this way, that he can not accept an amendment in the name of the committee unless he is authorized to do it.

In taking the position I have assumed on this matter, I have taken it upon my independent judgment. Of course, the views of the Secretary of the Treasury with regard to this matter are persuasive with me. I stated when I introduced this bill that it was introduced as an administration measure; that it was a scheme which had been worked out by the Treasury Department under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury to enable the Government to come to the assistance of the industries of the country and of the security market of the country.

Therefore, Mr. President, the legislation having come from that source, I think the views of the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to the effect upon the scheme which he has presented and asked the judgment of Congress upon are entitled to respect, but they do not control. The committee saw fit to amend the bill in particulars wherein they did not agree with the Secretary of the Treasury. The committee may change it now in particulars wherein the Secretary of the Treasury might differ, but I think under the circumstances, as he is the man responsible for the financing of the Government and as this is a recognized administration measure, the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury ought not to be resented by Senators, and his suggestion of an emendation of the measure ought not to be resented by Senators.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I agree with the last statement of the Senator, and I wish to state in this connection that I think the Secretary of the Treasury is one of the ablest of the officials who ever occupied that position. But what I rise to inquire is whether the committee in the consideration of this very important subject examined the present fiscal system, especially the Federal reserve regional bank system, and determined after full investigation that that law could not be so amended as to effectuate the same results which are sought in this bill?

I have read the proposed substitute of the Senator from Oklahoma, and it seems to me that we could have accomplished the same results by amending the Federal reserve law as are sought to be accomplished by this bill. We could have done it without creating another agency or instrumentality, and have done it in a way that would have been far better for the country as a whole. These bills providing for a central bank will tend to congest all financial matters in this one region or one section, and of necessity will be discriminatory against the policy which was sought to be engrafted into the statutes in the Federal reserve law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah that the committee did not directly have a proposition of that sort before it, but I think the trend of the hearings will indicate that the committee gave consideration to the question. I know that personally I have given a great deal of consideration to that question and have discussed it with members of the Federal Reserve Board, with the Secretary of the Treasury, and others, and I am absolutely certain that an amendment of that sort would not accomplish the purpose, but that, on the other hand, it would undermine the fundamental principles of the present reserve system.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] took the observations I made more seriously than I think he ought to have done. I have no disposition to do injustice to any officer of the Government, but I am rather old-fashioned in some of my views. That is my misfortune, no doubt. I have not "kept up with the procession." I have read the Constitution of the United States, which states that the President shall recommend to Congress matters of public concern, and he never hesitates to tell us what he thinks about legislative action.

As I look upon this bill, Mr. President, it is one of the most important measures that has come before Congress for its consideration since the beginning of the war, and I would much have preferred the President to have sent a communication here in the old-fashioned way or to address Congress, as he has been in the habit of doing, in this matter and then leave it to Congress to formulate the measure; of course, upon consultation with the officials of the Treasury Department. But that was not done; and I am not going to multiply words in saying that I think the system is a bad one, into which we have, perhaps, inadvertently fallen.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire is it not one of the most common practices here on the part of all committees of the Senate to constantly refer bills which are presented here to the departments which they affect for their advice?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a very good practice. Bills formulated in either House of Congress and going to a committee, as a rule, should be referred to the head of the department having jurisdiction over the subject. That was my habit when I was chairman of a committee of some consequence in the Senate. All such bills were referred to the head of the department or the officials of the Government having jurisdiction over that particular subject. That is undoubtedly a good custom; but I do not think it is a good custom to have it understood that bills can be formulated in the departments or at the White House, if you choose, to be sent to Congress with the statement accompanying them that it is necessary for Congress to act speedily in the matter, because the administration wants it done. I think it is a vicious habit, and I believe the time will come when it will be changed.

I recall when the late Senator from Idaho, Mr. Heyburn, sat at my right, with what indignation he resented that habit, which we were then falling into to some extent, and, if he were here to-day, I know exactly what he would say about the present situation. But we have passed that point; it has become a habit; and we have a bill here that was formulated by the department and sent to us with the suggestion that we should rush it through, and we have done the best we could to pass it.

The Senator from North Carolina will not deny, nor will the Senator from Virginia nor any other Senator deny, that we have spent time to great advantage in discussing this bill. The Secretary of the Treasury will hardly recognize his child when it reaches the President for his official action, provided the conferees on the part of the Senate stand by the action of this body. I am glad that the bill has been discussed as it has been and I am glad that it has been amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me, I want to say that, while I think this licensing section—that is the term, I believe, that has been used in speaking of it, though it is not a licensing section, but it is a substitute—while the section under consideration is, in my judgment, important, as I have tried to impress upon the Senate this morning, the real important part of this legislation is not these two sections, but it is the balance of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I agree absolutely with the Senator from North Carolina on that point, and if it were not for the balance of the bill we would not be wasting time here in discussing the licensing clause.

But, Mr. President, I have said about all I care to say. If the Senate thinks it wise to adopt, as in Commitee of the Whole, the substitute which has been offered by the Senator from Virginia, with the understanding that on to-morrow there will be an opportunity to amend it, if we see fit to undertake to do that, I am content.

I want to say to my good friend, the Senator from North Carolina, the chairman of the committee, that in any observations I made a little while ago I had no intention at all of reflecting in any way upon him. I have served on a great many committees of the Senate and it is a pleasure for me to say that I never have served under a Senator who was so courteous, so kind, so considerate of the rights of each individual member of the committee as has been the Senator from North Carolina. I want him to know that I have not intended to make any observations that could in any way reflect upon his management of this bill or upon his management of any of the bills that are being considered by that important committee.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before the Senator from New Hampshire takes his seat, if I may, I desire to say that I understood the Senator to state that on to-morrow there will be some opportunity of considering this very question now under consideration. I have been called out of the Chamber for half an hour or more, and I desire to ask, Is there an understanding of that kind?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would state to the Senator from Missouri that, at the suggestion and request of the Senator from New Hampshire, there was an understanding between him and myself that we would, so far as his objection was concerned, proceed with the vote upon this substitute, but that there would not be a vote upon the committee amendment in the Senate until to-morrow; that is, that we would proceed, if we could do so, to act as in Committee of the Whole upon this and any other matters that may arise.

Mr. STONE. To-morrow?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; to-day.

Mr. STONE. What are we to do to-morrow under this understanding?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, acts upon the bill to-day, it will be then halted until to-morrow, when we shall take the vote in the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the final passage of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. On the final passage of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, I intimated my entire willingness to have a unanimous-consent agreement to-day, if no other Senator objected to it, to take the final vote upon the bill at some hour to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. And the matter would be open for discussion to-morrow? Is that the understanding?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so; yes.

Mr. STONE. I mean, there would be no complaint or criticism or objection to any Senator discussing the bill and stating his views on it to-morrow?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill would be open to any amendment that might be reserved, as I understand.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have looked this susbtitute over rather hastily, but, if I gather its full purport, it has entirely eliminated from section 7 the license principle?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The issuance of any licenses or the withholding of licenses is entirely eliminated from this act. I think another clause has been added exempting a concern in the midst of its refunding operations. Am I right about that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the Senator is right about that. I will say to the Senator that the committee which is now in existence has never interfered with such refunding, and we were told that it was not their purpose to interfere with issues for refunding. That was not in the original bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the amendment goes even a step further than that and provides that borrowing on undertakings already entered upon, although not completed, may go on.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is in the original bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I want to say just a word now to the Senator from North Carolina, who seems to be a little sensitive about some remarks which have been made here. I do not think he ought to be sensitive at all. I think he ought to feel complimented upon his willingness to listen and to hear what has been said, and to lend his assistance to the perfection of this really important bill. I think that the discussion, if it has had any effect at all, has had the effect of driving this autocratic license system out of the bill. That is an achievement which latitude of debate has fully justified.

So far as I am concerned, I think the measure has been greatly improved, and I want to compliment the Senator from North Carolina for it. I do not know whether he drafted the amendment, or who drafted it, but wherever this ray of light came from it is entitled to be received with satisfaction and appreciation. We, in the midst of a great crisis, whatever is necessary to be done to win this war should be done and done promptly. Old idols must be put aside and the situation met in the broadest spirit, and met without unnecessary delay; whoever administers this law will do it with an eye single to the public good. Under ordinary conditions I could never vote for such a bill, but the occasion is so extraordinary that I feel it my duty to give the measure in its present form my support.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to offer the substitute to section 8, which I send to the desk. I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for section 8 it is proposed to insert the following:

That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be fined not more than $1,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, and any officer, director, or agent of any corporation or association, or member of any firm who shall knowingly participate in any such violation, neglect, or refusal shall be punished by a like fine or imprisonment, or both.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that amendment, if I understood it correctly, would subject a natural person to a much heavier penalty than a corporation. A corporation can only be fined a thousand dollars in the event it disregards the provisions of the law and is convicted, while a natural person can not only be fined a thousand dollars under similar circumstances, but as well can be imprisoned for a year. That is not right.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the officers of a corporation who violate the law are subject to the same penalty as the individual.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, why should we say anything about "a natural person"?

Mr. SWANSON. We could say "a corporation," because a corporation can only operate through its officers.

Mr. THOMAS. That is very true, but an individual may not be an officer of a corporation, and at the same time he may violate some provision of the law.

Mr. SWANSON. The provision is similar to that contained in the bill as it was reported from the committee of which the Senator is a member. The only difference is that the amendment now offered eliminates any penalty for violation of rules or regulations.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that perfectly, but if the bill which the Senator says I joined in reporting is the model for this amendment that fact should not prevent us from amending the proposed substitute so that the penalty will be the same in the case of an individual as in the case of a corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the same, Mr. President, as in the original bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Let us see. It provides—

That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be fined not more than $1,000—

That is the penalty which is provided by this proposed amendment; that is the penalty and sole penalty that would be inflicted upon those who are not natural persons; that is to say, corporations.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, the fine would apply both to corporations and to individuals.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly; but the amendment provides further—or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest that the Senator read a little further.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well. The amendment proceeds—and any officer, director, or agent of any corporation or association, or member of any firm, who shall knowingly participate in any such violation, neglect, or refusal shall be punished by a like fine or imprisonment, or both.

That is merely surplusage, because an officer, director, or agent of a corporation is a natural person and must be, and if this section be designed to apply only to natural persons, then the use of that expression is entirely superfluous.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, a corporation will have to pay a fine if it violates the law, and then when it comes to that the officers of the corporation will have to suffer the penalty.

Mr. THOMAS. A corporation will have, upon conviction, to pay a $1,000 fine, but a natural person, if convicted, may be imprisoned for not more than one year and fined in addition.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator to point out anything in the bill as it now stands which commands a corporation to do anything or prohibits a corporation from doing anything. I want to know what provision there is in the bill which a corporation as such could violate?

Mr. THOMAS. If there be no provision in this bill which a corporation can violate, there is no need at all of using the words "natural person"; there is no need of making any distinction between artificial and natural persons.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to suggest to the Senator that we might as well strike out reference to corporations entirely.

Mr. THOMAS. The word "corporation" does not appear to be necessary. If a special penalty different from the general penalty in the bill is made to apply to natural persons, then the implication is that corporations are included or may be included in the operation of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose we strike out the words "if a natural person."

Mr. THOMAS. I was just going to suggest that if the words "if a natural person," in line 4, are eliminated, the objection which I am urging will be removed.

Mr. SWANSON. I accept the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I move that the words "if a natural person" and the commas after the word "or" and after the word "person" be stricken from the proposed amendment.

Mr. REED. And the word "and" inserted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is not necessary.

Mr. STONE. So that it will read how?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado to the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 4 of the proposed substitute it is proposed to strike out the words "if a natural person" and the commas, so as to read:

That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year or both, and any officer, director, or agent of any corporation or association, or member of any firm, who shall knowingly participate in any such violation, neglect, or refusal, shall be punished by a like fine or imprisonment, or both.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator offering the amendment if it would not be well to strike out all after the words "imprisoned for not more than one year or both." It is simply a repetition. The provision before that covers any violation.

Mr. REED. I think the remainder of the amendment ought to go out.

Mr. SMOOT. That is my opinion.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know to what extent it would exonerate officers of corporations in case they should violate the law; but if Senators in charge of the bill think that there is no corporation affected by this provision, I can see no use of retaining the language.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think there is any corporation that would be affected——

Mr. SWANSON. Then I accept the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator did not permit me to finish my sentence—that would be affected by any violation of section 8, but I have not gone over the remainder of the bill for the purpose of seeing whether there may not be some corporations which would be affected by other sections of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The word "corporation" is not used. The amendment would apply only to those who could violate the act; and I think it only applies to persons.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think there is any serious objection to the language, however, being left in.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is any necessity for repeating that language, because the wording preceding the portion which reads "and any officer," and so forth, is so plain and direct that it covers anybody who might violate any of the provisions of the act. I think that the last part of the amendment is a limitation, if anything.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think that. It is a more definite indication that action by the officers of a corporation looking toward doing something that the law did not permit, would be treated as an individual act and, therefore, illegal. I think that is the only effect that the language would have, but I would myself hold that that would be the effect of the provision in any event.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and I think that the words ought to go out.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask what provision of this law can be violated so as to subject a person to fine or imprisonment? If I recollect aright, the only one who can be brought within the purview of this law is an officer of the Government in case he should do something prohibited by the act.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. The bill provides in another place that—

No director or officer of the corporation shall in any manner participate in the determination of any question affecting his personal interests, or the interest of any corporation, partnership, or association in which he is directly or indirectly interested.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A director or officer who violates that provision is the only person under this act who can be fined or imprisoned, with the possible exception of the case where there is an acceptance of a pledge for more than 75 per cent of its face value. Is not that so, I will ask the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Virginia has accepted a further amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. I do not accept that amendment. I do not know to what extent it might exonerate officers of a corporation, and I have not looked into it thoroughly. I think if an officer of a corporation violates the proposed law, he ought to be punished as much as an individual, and, as I have said, I have not looked into it sufficiently to determine that question. If it is surplusage and there is no necessity for it, it can be corrected when the bill reaches the Senate or in conference.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not see how an officer of a corporation can violate the proposed law; there is nothing for a corporation to do under the law; the corporations are not referred to in the law. The entire matter turns upon the question of the power of this committee to approve or disapprove of an application made to it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Missouri, because he has given the matter a great deal of thought.

Mr. REED. I think I can perhaps suggest a reason why it is wise to leave these words in. I believe that if the officers of the corporation we are creating by this bill were to do things in violation of the provisions of the bill—and attention has been called to two or three clauses of the bill they might violate—then, if this language is left in the bill, any one of those officers who concurs in an act which results in a violation by the corporation we are creating of some provision of the law would become thereby liable. So I think we had better leave the language in.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well, Mr. President.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, now that we are on the question of the violation of the proposed law and the punishment therefor, I direct the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that this bill creates a financial corporation, which I consider a bank, gives it millions of dollars, and does not provide a penalty for embezzling or appropriating the funds of the institution. This being a Federal statute, the common law would not apply to it; and it is necessary, just as we have done in the case of our national banks, to provide penalties to be imposed for misappropriation of funds. I found that out at the time the farm-loan act was under consideration. It was called to my attention by an official of the Treasury, who said that there was no provision in the Federal reserve act for punishing the embezzlement or misappropriation of funds of the Federal reserve banks. I think that there should be such a provision adopted in connection with this bill; and, if the chairman agrees with me, I shall be very glad to prepare such a provision and offer it to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish merely to say that I think the provisions of the Criminal Code cover all cases of embezzlement and are sufficiently comprehensive for the purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I must confess that the statement of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] somewhat amazes me. He may be correct about it, however; but these are Government funds in a sense, and that the embezzlement of such funds would not be such an offense as the courts could take jurisdiction of seems to me to be almost incredible. It may be true; but I have not investigated that question, and I understand the Senator says he has done so.

Mr. HOLLIS. I can show the Senator that I am correct. The very reason for establishing this central bank or finance corporation is because we do not want to put the Government into the banking business. We organize a separate corporation, and the Government is merely the stockholder. The Government does not own the funds—the corporation owns the funds—and if they are misappropriated they are not Government funds but they are funds belonging to a corporation.

Mr. REED. I understand that there is no amendment to the amendment now pending. In view of that, and in order to clear up a matter that has been much discussed here to-day, I want to offer an amendment to the proposed substitute.

There is a doubt expressed upon the floor of the Senate as to whether or not the criminal penalty, as it is now drawn, would apply to those who might sell securities that the board condemned, and, in view of the mere suggestion of that doubt, I think we might as well remove it. Accordingly, I move to add at the end of the proposed substitute the following language:

Provided, That the violation of any rule, order, or decision of the capital issues committee shall not be held to be a violation of this act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we struck out all of the provisions about license. We struck out all of the provisions about rules. We have omitted it all. Now, when we have omitted it and exempted it, why say that it shall not be a violation of the act not to comply with it?

Mr. REED. Just to be sure.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the effect of this will come from the moral support the people will give to what the board does. I do not think we should put in the bill an advertisement that they should pay no attention to any recommendations that are made. I believe that is the law, but I see no necessity for putting it in. This amendment has been agreed to by various gentlemen, and I introduced it understanding that there was an agreement, and it seems to me that the agreement ought to be carried out.

I hope the Senator will not insist on his amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I know a good deal about that agreement. I know that the purpose was to eliminate any possibility of penalizing any citizen for a mere violation of the ruling of the board. That was to be left without any penalty, and I though, the language perfectly clear, but good lawyers and Senators have suggested a doubt, and in view of the suggestion of the doubt it ought not to be left open to question in the future. I hope there will be no objection to the language proposed going in.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does the Senator, as a lawyer, believe that that is necessary?

Mr. REED. I have already said that I thought the proper construction of the bill would be such as to make this not necessary, but several Senators, good lawyers, have suggested to me that they want that possible doubt removed, and I therefore hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I can not see how the question could be a serious one, in view of the fact that this committee can do absolutely nothing but investigate and find that the issue of a security is or is not compatible with the public interest. There its functions end; there its findings end; and I do not see what there is to violate. Whether a man will or will not take their advice or act upon their suggestions is left absolutely discretionary. There is not a single element of compulsion about it.

Mr. REED. I am offering the amendment out of an abundance of caution. I have learned, in drawing contracts and papers, when I find candid men arriving at a construction different from the one I thought the words implied, that it is very well to guard it. I hope there will be no objection to putting in this language, and then we will all know that we are perfectly safe.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it will accomplish any purpose or object, but I do not think it can hurt anything, and therefore I am not disposed to make any controversy about it or to consume time in the discussion of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator says he does not think it will do any harm. Truly the pendulum of legislative conviction has swung from one extreme to the other during the last few hours in the Senate Chamber. We had before us a bill which provided rather a severe punishment for anyone who should violate the law as it was then drawn, and the Secretary of the Treasury thought not only that we should have the law compelling obedience to the commands of the Government, or what it might desire in this respect, but that we should impose quite a severe penalty.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. Now the persuasive oratory of those in the Senate who thought that we should depend upon the persuasive qualities of this bill rather than any power contained in it has swung the pendulum in the other direction, and now we go so far as to say in the proposed amendment that not only shall no one be bound by anything that is in this bill, but the amendment invites the public to disregard it by saying to them that they can be assured that there will be no penalty whatever for their disregard of this law.

I think we ought to get a little more information from the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury before we vote finally even upon this portion of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the provisions contained in the bill before the substitute of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] was presented are entirely different from the provisions of these sections as they appear in the printed bill. In the original bill, which we have been discussing here, and about which the remarks to which the Senator refers, were made upon the floor not only by myself, but by many other Senators, there was an authority vested in this committee to prohibit the issue of certain securities; and the violation of that prohibition was sought to be made an offense and was properly sought to be made an offense. Now, we have eliminated those provisions and have not conferred upon this committee any power to prohibit anything being done. We have confined its functions solely and exclusively to finding and reporting whether, in its judgment, a certain state of facts exists, and that is all. There is no finding that the committee is authorized to make under the statute that could be made the basis of a criminal offense.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, the Senator depends entirely upon the voluntary acquiesence of the public in conforming to this law?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia brings about.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, does not the Senator think that after inviting the voluntary acquiesence of the public it is a little inconsistent to say to the public in the same bill: "You need pay no attention to this"?

Mr. SIMMONS. That would be so if we were going to impose a penalty upon the public if they did not comply with the suggestions made by the committee; but no penalty is to be imposed upon the public or any one else.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think we ought to call their attention to the fact that we really do not mean anything by this bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. We are relying on the moral support the country will give to the action of this committee. Its influence will depend entirely upon the voluntary acquiescence of the country. In the same law in which we do that we are asked to invite them to pay absolutely no respect to it. Now, I am not going to accept that amendment. The Senate can put it in if they see proper. I see no occasion for putting in an act which is left to voluntary, moral support the statement that they need pay no attention to it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is nothing in this amendment that in any way tells the public to pay no attention to the orders of the board. There is a statement that it is not the intention or purpose to send anybody to the penitentiary for failing to obey some regulation of the board. It is admitted that that is the intent and purpose of the Senate. That is the reason why section 8 is being amended; and if it is the intent and purpose of the Senate, it ought to be expressed.

It is contended, however, that it is sufficiently expressed. If it is sufficiently expressed, it is certain people will find it out; but if it be the intent and purpose of the Senate and it is not sufficiently expressed, then we ought now, while we are making the rule, to remove all doubt.

I hope the amendment will go in. I very much more desire it now than if it had never been offered, for the reason that if this amendment now, having been offered, be rejected, it will be to a certain extent persuasive in a court of the fact that the Senate rejected the amendment because they wanted to reject the idea. Therefore I think it is now imperatively necessary that the amendment should go in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not at all agree with the view of the Senator from Missouri. It is impossible for me to find anything leading to a construction that would hold penal a violation of a regulation because we declined to say that we did not intend to make it penal, when we did not have anything at all in the bill that indicated that it was to be penal. We have stricken out every line that could possibly be construed as rendering penal a failure to comply with the regulations of the bond commission or a failure to comply with the advice of its members. We have intentionally done that. There is not a syllable left in the bill from which it could possibly be construed that it was penal. Then why should we go further and say that the act shall not be construed as making penal a failure to comply with regulations when we have used a word that made noncompliance illegal?

I do not like to put myself in the attitude of adopting that kind of an amendment, and I will vote against it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to the discussion of these two sections of the bill. I have had very great doubt whether this bill should become a law or not, but as the bill is now written I do not think there is any grave danger growing out of section 7, because section 7 as it now stands in the bill is merely advisory. There is no compulsion in the bill. Of course, there is this power behind section 7: That if a board, made up in its majority part of the members of the Federal Reserve Board, refused to O. K. or approve of a financial issue, it almost goes without saying that their negativing the issue will prevent it from being quoted or being sold, because practically in peace times the Federal Reserve Board's influence over the great banks and trust companies of this country is such that they can prevent the acceptance of securities by advising against them; and certainly in war times, when there is no other means of securing the surplus money of the country, except through Government agencies, their request is a command, and nobody can float securities in defiance of it.

That, however, exists to-day without this law. It is not necessary to put this law on the statute books to bring that about. It is a law to-day so far as its effect is concerned, because they have already organized a bureau in the Treasury Department under the Federal Reserve Board for this purpose, and it is doing business, and doing it effectively, now. But when you come to the next section, I should have been very much opposed to voting for any law that provides that the rules and regulations made by some subordinate official shall be punished as a crime if not obeyed. It is bad legislation in any case. It would be particularly bad legislation if it had been attached to this bill; but that has been removed. It has been stricken out. Now, the law stands that any man who violates this act shall be subject to certain pains and penalties.

I should like to know how he can violate the act. I should like to have some Senator tell me in what particular he can violate this act as it stands now. He can not violate the act by offering securities. He may not be able to sell his securities; he may not be able to float them, but you have pulled the teeth out of section 7, and as it is now written any man can offer securities as far as he wants to go. Of course, he probably will not go any further than offering them, but it will be no violation of the act. The outside person who is not connected with the corporation can not violate the law by doing something with the corporation, because these are going to be Government agencies. The only possible violation of the act is that somebody connected with the corporation might steal some of the corporation's money, and that is punished under the general statute. The general law of the land will punish a man for committing embezzlement, either against the corporation or against the Government. Therefore, so far as I see, as it stands now—and I am glad of it—the penal clause of this bill does not mean anything, and I think it would be just as well if it were left out entirely.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am interested in the Senator's statement that the general crime of embezzlement would be punished if the funds of this bank were embezzled. I hope the Senator will look that up, because, unless there is such a law, I shall offer to-morrow an amendment making it an offense to embezzle from the bank.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I interrupt to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to section 47 of the Penal Code, which I think exactly meets the suggestion which he made a few moments ago. If I have the permission of the Senator from Alabama——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield,

Mr. THOMAS. The section reads as follows:

> Whoever shall embezzle, steal, or purloin any money, property, record, voucher, or valuable thing whatever of the moneys, goods, chattels, records, or property of the United States shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is exactly the point. We set up a corporation here and give it funds. We do it because we do not want the Government of the United States in the banking business. When we appropriate that money and turn it over to this corporation it is accounted the property of the corporation, and ceases to be the property of the Government. That is exactly the point that I make.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, if the Senator is right, we would have to amend this bill also by providing penalties against the forgery of securities.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; we should—exactly so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I think this corporation is the property of the Government of the United States, because the Government of the United States owns all of the stock of the corporation.

Mr. HOLLIS. No; that is not so, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean to say it is not so that they own all of the stock?

Mr. HOLLIS. They do own all of the stock; but I may own all of the stock of a corporation, and yet if some one else steals its funds he does not steal my funds; he steals the funds of the corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. He steals the property of the owner.

Mr. HOLLIS. Oh, not at all. The owner is the corporation. That is entirely different. Any lawyer knows that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I am not contending that there is a Federal statute now in existence that punishes a man for committing a crime against a Federal corporation, nor do I think there should be. That is not what I contended for at all. We have had Federal corporations before this time. The Union Pacific Railroad was chartered and run and exercised its functions until a few years ago under a Federal charter. If somebody embezzled the funds of the Union Pacific Railroad, it seems to me there could be no question that under the laws of the State where the embezzlement took place he could be arrested, fined, and imprisoned. I do not know that a banking corporation is any more important than a railroad corporation. The position I take is that in each State of the Union or in the District of Columbia, wherever this corporation is performing its functions, if a crime is committed, the laws of the community where the crime is committed will be sufficient to punish the individual who commits it. I do not think there can be any doubt about it, and I do not think it is necessary for us to create penal statutes every time we create a Federal corporation. There may be some cases where it is necessary to have laws to prevent counterfeiting, or depredation of the mails, or some peculiar Federal function. It is not a peculiar Federal function that we are building up here. As a matter of fact, wiping all the camouflage and the clouds away from it, we are building a financial trust. That is all there is to it. We are building the biggest financial trust that this country has ever seen. We are building it because it is necessary for war purposes.

Mr. President, I regret that it is necessary to carry this Government so far afield from the usual course of government. I regret that it is necessary to invade the business of the people of the United States, but I want to say that I do not believe in fighting this war in a half-hearted way. I think if there is any criticism anywhere along the line, it is not that we have not made mistakes; it is that this war has been on, so far as the Government of the United States is concerned, for nearly a year, and we have not got the men that we ought to have on the firing line of France, and we have not got the ships that we ought to have on the sea. I do not believe in fighting this war with a half-way punch. There is but one way to win it, and one way that it ever will be won, and that is to fight it all along the line, in arms, in ships, and in finance. Therefore I am going to vote for this bill, and I am going to vote to create a governmental financial trust, because I think it is necessary to sustain not only the finances of the Government but the finances of institutions on which this Goverment is relying to perform its war functions. That is the only justification for this bill, and it is a real justification for it.

The real power that is left in this bill is all the power that it is necessary to have in the bill; and that is, we turn over to a corporation to sustain the credits of the country a half billion dollars and give them a credit of $4,000,000,000 more to place about the country to keep the great industries of this country moving and doing business. That is the real power in the bill. The real power that is carried in the bill is turning over to five men, as a corporation, the right to divert where they please a half billion dollars in cash and four billions in credits. It would be an unthinkable thing in time of peace, but in time of war it is the only course to pursue. The only way to win the war is for this country to get behind this war, not in piecemeal, but with its full power and strength.

Your boys, the boys of this country, stand on the firing line of France to-day. Your enemy is trying to drive through their trenches. He will not come through this year; but if this country does not respond financially and industrially to a greater extent than it has already responded, you are in danger next year; and if we do not want a "next year," but want victory to perch on our banners this year, then we have got to consent to yield our peace-time ideas, our peace-time precedents, and adopt the method that is going to be effective.

So far as the criminal provision in this bill is concerned, it does not help this bill. It does not help the war. It does not accomplish any results. It may be used to threaten somebody with, but it is not necessary. The real steam behind this financial locomotive is the money that is carried in the bill. Therefore I do not see any reason why the amendment of the Senator from Missouri should not be adopted; but, far better, I should like to see the whole of section 8 stricken out of the bill, as it accomplishes no result.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] this forenoon spoke to us very entertainingly upon the psychology of Pullman sleeping cars. I think he could entertain himself to a far greater extent if he would study the psychology of the Senate in passing and in expressing its objections to certain measures in certain bills, and note how, for scores of years, Senators have voted time and time and time again to insert certain provisions in certain bills and in almost every important bill, and then finally have come to the conclusion that the provisions for which they have voted day after day are abhorrent to every sense of justice and propriety, and they are extremely shocked that anyone should dare to propose the insertion in any bill of a provision of the kind against which they are hurling their oratory.

I am impelled to note the remarks of the Senator from Alabama just now in discussing his serious objection to any penal clause affecting a mere rule or regulation of any department. Mr. President, while he was speaking I lifted up from this desk the revenue law approved October 3, 1917, and I notice that that revenue law provides as follows:

> (f) All persons, corporations, partnerships, or associations undertaking as a matter of business or for profit the collection of foreign payments of interest or dividends by means of coupons, checks, or bills of exchange shall obtain a license from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and shall be subject to such regulations enabling the Government to obtain the information required under this title, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe—and whoever knowingly undertakes to collect such payments as aforesaid without having obtained a license therefor, or without complying with such regulations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and for each offense be fined in a sum not exceeding $5,000, or imprisoned for a term not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court—

Following exactly the terms of the proposed law that we have been discussing. The Senator from Massachusetts was shocked, the Senator from Alabama was shocked, and both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from North Dakota voted for this provision in that bill without ever batting an eye, and it never occurred to anyone of us to raise this awful objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not like to have the Senator quote me as voting for a revenue bill when I did not vote for it. One of the proudest moments of my life is to be able to stand here and say that I did not vote for that bill, if the Senator means the last revenue bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. There were just exactly such provisions in the Underwood revenue bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. Did not the Senator vote for that bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. McCUMBER. In every revenue bill that we have passed in the last 20 years I will guarantee the Senator will find a provision making it a penal offense to disobey the regulations of the Treasury Department which were found necessary to collect the revenue.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say that we did not often find in the law penal statutes against regulations. I do say that since I have been in Congress I have refrained from favoring that kind of legislation except where the statute clearly defines what the regulation shall be. More than that, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggested this morning, when it is a general provision, without any indication in the statute as to what the regulations shall be, I doubt very much whether it comes within the terms of the Constitution and as to whether the courts would uphold it. But I have not denied that it can be done. Sometimes it has been done; but I do say, and it is not a new assertion on my part, I have said it for 20 years, I do not believe there is any more unwise legislation or unsafe legislation that a legislative body can enact than to sever itself from its own function of legislation and in a bill to prescribe a general penalty clause, endangering the liberties of the citizens of the United States, and then turn over to some departmental clerk the right to prescribe what the rules shall be the violation of which shall send a man to the penitentiary. Now, I do not believe that that is wise legislation. I do not say that there has not been a precedent for it. The Senator misunderstood me if he thought I said there had not been a precedent for it.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I did not say that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I still contend there is no more unwise legislation that we can pass than to surrender our own function and turn it over to a departmental clerk when the very liberties and reputation of American citizens are involved.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think every legislator should be extremely wary about providing a penalty for a rule when he does not know what that rule may be. But the point that I wished to make is this, that we make this the principal excuse for changing the law in our argument, while we have placed in our statute books, in every one of our revenue laws and every other important law, rules and regulations exactly in the same way as we place them in this bill, and we all voted for them because we thought it was necessary; and it is simply the fact that we are surprised and shocked and horrified at this particular time that anything of that character should have been found in any bill before the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not want to say anything at this time except to express my thorough approval of what the Senator from Alabama suggests and to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that on Saturday the distinguished Senator from North Dakota himself thought it was an unwise and unsafe thing to do. Whether it was an unwise and unsafe thing to do or not, that is no reason why we should keep on doing it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offered the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of clearing up not what I thought was a doubt, but what some other Senators had thought was a doubt. It has provoked a great deal of discussion, most of which has not been pertinent to the particular matter. A number of Senators have asked me to withdraw the amendment in order that we may get along, and have insisted that there is no possibility of any court ever taking the view that the penal clause applies to a mere failure to obey some order or rule of the committee. I am so thoroughly grounded in that view and believe it so well taken that for that consideration alone and for that reason I will withdraw the amendment, and the Senate may vote on the question whether we want to impose any penalty at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 11, after the word "deposits," insert "or any building and loan association."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will indulge me for a very few minutes while I explain the necessity for this amendment.

The bill provides that "any savings bank or other banking institution which receives savings deposits" shall have the benefits of the act, but it does not grant any privilege of this kind to building and loan associations. It seems to me that the position of those who may oppose this amendment is due to their failure to appreciate the charter powers of many of the building and loan associations.

I have no objection whatever to extending this privilege to the savings banks and savings societies, but the same reasons which suggest that they should have the benefit of the provisions of this bill apply also to building and loan associations.

I want the Senate to realize the importance of this amendment. In 1915 there were 6,806 building and loan associations in the United States. They had a membership of 3,334,899. They had assets amounting to $1,484,205,875.

In Ohio there were 657 of these institutions, with a membership of 649,126, including depositors, and the assets of the building and loan associations in Ohio amounted that year to $263,106,613.

In my own State building and loan associations have the right to receive deposits, and they do receive deposits. They have a right to sell stock, and they do sell stock, with withdrawal privileges, to the stockholder. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the Ohio code in that behalf. Section 9647 provides that—

Such corporations shall have all the powers set forth in the following sections of this chapter.

Then section 9648 provides, among other things, that they shall have the right "to receive money on deposits."

Section 9649 provides the right "to issue stock to members on such terms and conditions as the constitution and by-laws provide," and that includes the right to provide that these stockholders shall have the privilege of withdrawing all the money they have paid upon this stock.

Section 9651 provides the right "to permit members to withdraw all or part of their stock deposits at such times and upon such terms as the constitution and by-laws provide."

Section 9652 reads:

To permit withdrawal of deposits upon such terms and conditions as the association provides except by check or draft.

I will not take the time to go further into the provisions of the statutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio if he has considered the language on line 5 page 1. In my opinion the word "association" used there is sufficiently broad to cover building and loan associations, and if the board sees fit to avail itself of the securities of such an association for housing purposes or otherwise, wherever it is regarded as essential in the conduct of the war, it could include the very associations suggested by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator's construction of section 1 is correct, then there can be do objection to this amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it is broad enough. I will say further to the Senator that I am very sure the word corporation includes banks.

Mr. POMERENE. But the Senator will notice the committee has seen fit to specially provide for savings banks and other banking institutions which receive savings. In my own State the building and loan associations, or many of them, are substantially savings banks. For instance, in my own city we have two building and loan associations that advertise on the front of their buildings that they will pay 5 per cent interest for deposits. The building and loan associations have millions of deposits, and these millions are loaned out in part for building purposes and in part on other securities, and they have already been seriously embarrassed because they have not been able to get the necessary accommodations. Under the Ohio building and loan laws they are required to keep their deposits in some bank as a depository.

I have before me a communication from Mr. H. F. Cellarius, the secretary of a building and loan association in Ohio. I am not going to take the time to read it all, but I want to call attention to a paragraph or two.

For instance, in the city of Dayton, which was in the midst of the flood district in 1913, during this last season there were withdrawals to the amount of more than a million dollars. These building and loan associations went to their banks to get accommodations. They were not able to get them. They tried to get accommodations from the Federal reserve bank, but under the provisions of the Federal reserve act they could not get these accommodations, and they were very much embarrassed by reason thereof.

It so happens that we have provided in the State of Ohio for the organization of conservancy districts. These conservancy districts are authorized to sell bonds for the purpose of building dams and otherwise providing against damages by succeeding floods. Bonds were sold in anticipation of the collection of assessments, and those in charge of these conservancy sales made deposits of a portion of the proceeds of these bonds in the building and loan associations. Otherwise they would have been very much embarrassed financially.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think there is a great deal to be said in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, but if I wanted that amendment specifically incorporated in the law I would hesitate to offer it, in view of the fact that it will probably be defeated, and thus the general terms of the bill, which in my opinion include building and loan associations, would by reason of that rejection afford some excuse, perhaps, for not including them, either within the first section or in subdivision (d), which authorizes this board to make advances "to any corporation owning or controlling," and so forth, "any railroad or other public utility and to any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business, * * * whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war." I think that language includes building and loan associations. Therefore, I should dislike very much to see the amendment voted down.

Mr. POMERENE. Either my friend, the Senator from Michigan, is right in his construction or he is wrong. If he is right in his construction, there can be no objection to my amendment. If he is wrong in his construction, then I insist the amendment shall be placed in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But a vote would give a legislative construction to the view which perhaps prevails among Senators that it is not included. I would not like to have that vote.

Mr. POMERENE. I am going to go on the presumption that the Senate is going to do the right thing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Michigan is entirely in error. I do not think the savings banks or building and loan associations would be included in the sections to which the Senator from Michigan has referred. Those sections provide for assistance only to industries whose operations are necessary or contributory to the war. That qualification applies to every loan that may be made to any institution provided in the bill except building and loan associations. Believing they were of an exceptional character, it was thought necessary to make a provision for their exclusion because of the fact that the operations of savings banks are not necessary or contributory to the war. It is true that depositors may take the money out of the concern and contribute it, but the operations of the corporation itself in their very nature could not be necessary or contributory to the war. Therefore it was necessary to insert a provision——

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand the Senator to say that it was his judgment and the judgment of the committee that the savings banks were not necessary to the war?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator understood me to say that we expressly provided for the inclusion of the savings banks, not because the operations of the banks themselves were necessary or contributory to the war but——

Mr. POMERENE. Then, why should they have the privileges of this act?

Mr. SIMMONS. Because it was considered of great public importance by reason of the fact that they accept deposits from the laboring people of the country, and they take those deposits and buy securities with them. It was suggested that when the withdrawal of these deposits for the purpose of investment in Liberty bonds or other securities offered by the Government reduces the deposits beyond the safety point the bank had no way of protecting itself except by putting its securities upon the market and thereby reimbursing itself the loss of those deposits, and those securities were of a character that was not liquid and for which there was not at present a sufficient market.

The only argument I am making, if the Senator will permit me, is—I am not arguing against his proposition now; I am saying nothing about it; I am simply showing him that savings banks and building and loan associations are not included in the word "association," because the associations which the other sections of the bill authorize to come to this board and secure loans are associations whose actual operations are inherently necessary or contributory to the war.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think I know the chairman of the committee desires to be perfectly fair in this matter. There is not any reason why he should discriminate in favor of the savings banks and against the building and loan associations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstands me. I have not expressed any view upon that subject at all. I am merely trying to show the Senator——

Mr. POMERENE. The purpose of my statement is to compel, if I can, the admission from the Senator from North Carolina that the same reasons which urged him to include savings banks in this bill will require him to consent to the placing therein of building and loan associations.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator can satisfy the Senate that the building and loan associations stand upon a parity with reference to the reason which I stated induced us to include savings banks specifically, why, of course, the Senate ought to adopt his amendment. If he can not do that, the Senate ought not, in my judgment, adopt the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Did the Senator from North Carolina hear the reading of the Ohio statutes upon this subject?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did.

Mr. POMERENE. Those statutes provide specifically that stock can be sold to members with withdrawal privileges. That means that, whether the stock is paid up in full or only 50 per cent of it is paid up, when the stockholder complies with the regulations of the building and loan association he can withdraw the amount he has paid plus dividends and less charges thereon, and surrender the stock.

The statute also provides that these building and loan associations may receive savings deposits and that they can be withdrawn. I am going to take the liberty to send to the desk a memorandum from Mr. H. F. Cellarius, the secretary of the United States League of Local Building and Loan Associations, and respectfully ask Senators to listen to its reading.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire, who first addressed the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the memorandum is read, will the Senator from Ohio permit me a word?

Mr. POMERENE. I have yielded to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. When the Senator discussed this matter on a former occasion, I suggested that there was a marked difference, in my opinion, between building and loan associations and savings banks, citing the fact that, as I understood, the building and loan associations were paying 6 per cent interest. I did not then know that they deposited their money as savings in any of those banks. The Senator from Ohio now states that they do; and I presume they do so all over the country. If that be so it affects the aspect of this question very materially, to my mind, and I am strongly inclined to think that the amendment of the Senator ought to be adopted.

Mr. POMERENE. I can assure the Senator from New Hampshire that the practice to which I have referred is very general in my own State.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am, therefore, inclined to think that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio ought to be agreed to. Building and loan associations are very numerous in my State, and, indeed, throughout New England. If they are losing their deposits and fail to find any medium of relief, it seems to me they ought to come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. POMERENE. The memorandum which I have just sent to the desk to have read will demonstrate that very conclusively, indeed.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the indulgence of the Senator from Ohio long enough to give notice of a reservation of a amendment which I may desire to offer in the Senate as a substitute for section 7, which was adopted in the Senate, as it occurs in the substitute which is as follows:

Such committee may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by it from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate, pass upon, and determine whether or not the sale or offering for sale or for subscription—

And so forth.

I desire to reserve the right to offer an amendment; to substitute for the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury," the words "and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury." That will remove an ambiguity which has been discussed here, and I think will make it plain that the committee shall have the power to make its rules, and once they have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, then to proceed in its own way to investigate and to pass upon and determine the questions that may come before it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I now ask that the memorandum which I have sent to the desk may be read.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me merely to give a notice?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I also desire to reserve the right of offering an amendment when the bill gets into the Senate to strike out the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury"; and if the amendment suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is adopted, then I also reserve the right to move to strike out those words also.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that the memorandum which I have sent to the desk may now be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Memorandum urging relief for building and loan associations in the war finance corporation bill.

In behalf of the United States League of Local Building and Loan Associations, representing the domestic building and loan associations in the several States, I desire to call your attention to the urgent necessity of making some provision in the war finance corporation bill for the relief of these associations similar to that which has been made for the savings banks.

There is even greater necessity for providing for the building associations than there is for savings banks, for the reason that their assets, amounting to nearly $2,000,000,000, are almost entirely invested in mortgage loans on real estate and are not as liquid as the assets of most savings banks. Every argument which applies to a savings bank applies with equal force in favor of the building association.

Since the liberty loan issues have been floated there have been very heavy withdrawals from the associations by their members for investment in liberty bonds, and for the past four or five months the ordinary business of making loans to members for building purposes has practically ceased and most of the receipts have been paid out to withdrawing members. This condition will undoubtedly continue during the period of the war, and as further issues are floated there will be increasingly heavier withdrawals, with the result that the ordinary receipts which are already being diminished will not be able to take care of the withdrawals, and withdrawal applications will have to be filed to await their order of payment. In ordinary times the associations are able to go to their depository banks and make temporary loans to take care of withdrawing members, but under existing war conditions the banks are refusing to loan money to these association because their paper is not rediscountable with the Federal reserve banks. Building associations ordinarily pay their withdrawals on demand in the same manner as do the savings banks.

During the floating of the last liberty loan the withdrawals of members who bought liberty bonds from the building associations in the city of Dayton, Ohio, were so heavy that the ordinary functions of these associations were halted for a number of months. They first sought relief in vain from their banks and then also applied to the Federal reserve bank, but were informed that under the law no financial assistance could be granted them. Fortunately, the Conservancy Flood Relief Board had just floated a $10,000,000 issue, and this board came to the relief of the Dayton associations by depositing with them nearly $1,000,000 realized from the bond sale.

Situations similar to that which existed in Dayton will arise in other localities as further drives are made for the sale of liberty loan bonds, and unless some provision is made for the relief of building associations when the necessity arises, their members will not be permitted to withdraw money from these associations with which to purchase liberty bonds, so that it is important, as far as the Government itself is concerned, to afford every possible relief, for by so doing it will be actually helping itself.

It is represented that under the conditions imposed by the bill no building association would make application to the war finance corporation for assistance unless the dire necessities of the situation compelled it to do so. It is respectfully urged, in order to avoid a financial disturbance among these associations, that some source should be provided to which they may go to relieve their stress, when ordinary banking channels are closed to them.

Respectfully submitted.

H. F. CELLARIUS, Secretary.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, March 1, 1918.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it seems to me that the statement made by Mr. Cellarius is complete in and of itself. He points out especially the condition in Dayton, and that is just the condition which our good friend, the chairman of the committee, anticipates may happen in every town where there is a savings bank.

I want to call attention to the further fact—and I do it because in the discussion the other day some reference was made to it—that it is the desire to discourage building. If that is limited to nonessential or unnecessary building, I am in hearty accord with the suggestion at this particular time; but in many of our growing industrial towns one of the serious problems with which it is necessary to deal is the housing problem for the laboring men. I know that is true in my own city of Canton and in many other cities in the State of Ohio. I trust that the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the savings of the poor go into building and loan associations exactly as they go into savings banks. Building and loan associations are for two purposes: One is to enable people to build their own homes, and the other is purely to afford an opportunity for investment. Many people who take out building and loan association shares never borrow on them and never build.

These institutions will probably have to cease their building operations largely. That will largely cut off their income, and they stand in my section of the country almost exactly as the savings banks do.

To include them in the paragraph that deals with savings banks does not make it compulsory on the war-finance corporation to advance funds. The provision will be merely permissive; they will advance sums in cases where an unfortunate financial situation might arise if the relief were not extended. They will not do it unless such a financial situation does arise. I can not see that the amendment will do any harm and it may afford very necessary relief to include them.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I submit an amendment to the bill, and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that action will be taken. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire to give my assent to the amendment. I think it ought to go in the bill for the reasons which have already been stated. I merely want to say that I approve the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the operations of building and loan associations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, then they are already provided for in this bill, and they are provided for under paragraph (d) of the bill, which is very much more favorable to associations and corporations than the paragraph to which the Senator from Ohio has offered his amendment. If the Senator will turn to page 9 of the bill he will find that under paragraph (d) this provision is made:

To any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and growing business whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war—

I think I have heretofore said to the Senate that that was a very far-reaching provision. Under it, in my opinion, all corporations and all associations not specifically provided for in paragraphs (b) and (c) of the section can apply for assistance.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not quite understand the opposition of the Senator to this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will wait until I get through, perhaps he will.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment, Mr. President, is offered to paragraph (c) of section 6 of the bill, and that paragraph provides:

(c) To make advances from time to time, upon such terms, not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe, for periods not exceeding one year, to any savings bank or other banking institution which receives savings deposits—

The information that the committee had, Mr. President, was that outside of a very few building and loan associations in the United States there was no chance whatever of making a run on building and loan associations. Very few of them have demand deposits, and I call attention to the letter that the Senator had read at the desk, for, among other things, it stated that in case they did not receive assistance the depositors would have to await their order of payment.

I understand, Mr. President—I know it is the case in my own State—that members of a building and loan association, if they desire to withdraw their so-called deposits, not demand deposits, from the association, await their turn, and they are paid in the order in which the application is made for withdrawal. No run can be made upon any building and loan association, that I am aware of, in the United States. Members of the association can not put the association in the hands of a receiver. That can only happen through losses in the administration of the association—losses so great that they impair the standing of the association. The object of this bill is to assist institutions that have been prevented, by reason of the Government of the United States monopolizing the money market, from realizing quickly upon their assets in order to meet any emergency or run upon the bank or the institution that would cause its failure.

If the building and loan associations were in that position they ought to be included in this bill and, perhaps, ought to be specifically referred to; but my construction of the bill is that they are already provided for in paragraph (d), and under much more favorable conditions than they would be under paragraph (c). But if we begin to enumerate the different associations that are to be taken care of, I want to say now that the irrigation companies of the West and the Middle West certainly ought to be included in the bill, as they contribute directly to the production of food, which is so necessary in the carrying on of the war. And they are in this position: Bonds that they have issued in the past are maturing. I do not think there are very many of them maturing this year, but no doubt some of them will be. They are not mentioned; and if we are going to undertake to mention all of the associations or corporations to be taken care of in this bill, I doubt very much whether we can do so in such a way that every kind of business in the country will be covered.

I thought, and I still think, that paragraph (d) of this section is altogether too broad in its scope. It may be administered so that no harm will come, and no doubt it will be, but the provisions of the paragraph are such that thousands of applications will be made that can not and should not be favorably considered.

Another thing, Mr. President, I want to say that the witnesses who appeared before the committee thought that the capital issues committee ought to follow the policy that has been followed by England and France, and, as far as possible, prevent the building of houses from one end of the country to the other. That does not mean that no homes shall be built, but it does mean that while we are in this war if there are families that have lived in a home for the past 20 years or more, they can wait at least until the war is over before undertaking to build a larger or a better house. Every time one is built it interferes with the production of the lumber that is necessary for the construction of our ships. Every time one is built it takes from the steel production of this country an amount of steel that ought to have been converted into the ships that we so greatly need. I approve that policy, Mr. President, and it has been approved of by England and by France, and if Senators will take notice they will find that the amount of money that has been spent in those countries for the erection of homes of any sort since this war began amounts to very little indeed, and in fact is almost negligible.

Therefore, Mr. President, I believe that the provisions of the bill are broad enough. If the board want to render any assistance whatever to building and loan associations, or to life insurance associations, or to fire insurance associations, or corporations of any kind or character I have no doubt but that they can do it under the provisions of the bill as it stands to-day, but I do not believe it is wise for us to undertake now to begin to enumerate all of these different institutions.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I do not agree with the conclusions of the senior Senator from Utah on this question. I do agree with him that we ought to do everything in our power to discourage the building of factories for other than war purposes, large office buildings, hotels, and other structures that require large quantities of steel and building material; but to say that we should discourage the building of homes ordinarily constructed through building and loan associations I think a mistake.

Mr. President, I know of no better instrument to utilize for the construction of homes where they are needed for munition plants, our shipyards, and for other purposes than building and loan associations. In my own State these institutions are conducted on exactly the same basis as savings banks. They are chartered under the savings-bank law.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me before he leaves that phase of the matter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must know that we have already appropriated $50,000,000 for building these homes in the neighborhood of munition plants, and I will say to the Senator that there is another bill that will be passed that carries $50,000,000 more for the same purpose. I agree with the Senator that homes of that kind ought to be built because they are absolutely necessary.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am aware that we have authorized the appropriation of $50,000,000 for the building of houses by the Shipping Board; but my notion is that we can use these very building and loan associations, and they will be utilized, without being compelled to go to the Shipping Board for assistance. My judgment is that there will be very little call upon this corporation by the building and loan associations; but the very fact that they can call upon it will renew confidence in them and will tend to encourage people to deposit their money in them.

I have an amendment which covers this matter in a different way; but I shall vote for the Senator's amendment because I believe it will do no harm and may be very helpful.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 10, after the word "company," it is proposed to insert "or company organized under the banking or insurance laws of any State," so that if amended the paragraph will read:

(b) To make advances, upon such terms not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances, (1) to any bank, banker, or trust company, or company organized under the banking or insurance laws of any State which has made and which has outstanding any loan or loans to any person, firm, corporation, or association—

And so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if he would not be willing to confine his amendment to insurance companies? To extend it to any banking concern or other concern that may be authorized under the banking laws of a State is mighty broad.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, this amendment would include insurance companies and mortgage companies. If the Senator will permit the amendment to go in reading "any company organized under the insurance laws of any State"——

Mr. SIMMONS. Why not say "any insurance company"?

Mr. CALDER. The reason why I can not accept the Senator's suggestion is that I have in mind mortgage companies.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, the Senator knows that we can not include every concern.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, we have in New York mortgage companies that have mortgages on real estate aggregating a billion dollars, and I am exceedingly anxious to have this law in such shape that these companies, if necessary, may come to the corporation for relief.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I want to say that I heartily concur in the main provisions of this measure. I believe it is a necessary one and one that will contribute much to the stability of business. I doubt if the country could go much farther with its business affairs without the enactment of some such measure as this. I simply ask that this amendment be adopted and that one other in exactly the same language be put in the next paragraph, which permits companies organized and doing business under the banking laws or insurance laws of the respective States to come in under the operation of this bill. I can see no reason why this amendment should not be adopted. I believe it strengthens the measure. I believe it will popularize the measure, and I am certain it will do no harm.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I rise to indorse what the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has said. It does not seem to me that it can do any possible harm to insert his amendments in the bill.

The cooperative banks, building and loan associations, and insurance companies organized under the laws of States are somewhat different in character, and the laws of the States are materially different. If none of these institutions need assistance, of course it will not be given to them; but if they do need assistance, their funds being essentially the savings of the people, it does seem to me that it would be desirable to have the power to give them such assistance as they may require.

I hope, therefore, that those amendments will be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment stated in full.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 10, after the words "or trust company," it is proposed to insert the words "or company organized under the banking or insurance laws of any State."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, my objection to this amendment is its indefinite character. I do not know what it would embrace. It refers to corporations organized under certain departments of certain States. If the Senator's amendment specified the corporations that he desires to have added, we would be able to deal with it with knowledge. If the Senator will content himself with including insurance companies, I shall not make any objection to that.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am familiar with the banking and insurance laws of my own State; and in that State the amendment would include life insurance companies that have assets in New York State of over $5,000,000,000, and loans to their policyholders of over $800,000,000. Under the terms of these policies the policyholders can borrow nearly the total of the premiums paid, and it is possible that at times there may be some need for relief for these insurance companies. I pointed out the other day, in discussing this subject, that a great conflagration might occur that would require the fire insurance companies to have relief. It is possible, too, that the same thing might be true in the matter of mortgage companies, which loan vast sums of money on bonds and mortgages. This corporation will not loan to these companies unless they have the proper security, and under such conditions that it ought to be loaned; but this is very important, Mr. President, and this amendment is asked for by men who are in sympathy with this measure and who believe that it should be extended to protect the great interests of the country that may become involved as the result of the drain upon the finances of the Nation.

As an example, we have in New York City alone over $4,000,000,000 loaned out on bonds and mortgages on real estate. At least one-third of this becomes due every year and must be taken care of. To-day there is no money available in the city of New York to be loaned on bonds and mortgages, largely because the money in that market has been taken up in the purchase of liberty bonds. I am exceedingly anxious to meet this situation, and it is in part my object in offering this amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have just gotten the amendment. The language the Senator wishes to incorporate in the bill are the words:

> Or any company organized under the banking or the insurance laws of the State.

It does not make any difference what sort of a company the banking laws or the insurance laws of the State may authorize to create they would be included in the language. I think it is entirely too indefinite.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator read the language which follows?

> Which has made and which has outstanding any loan or loans to any person, firm, corporation, or association whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war and evidenced by a note or notes—

And so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is not the language first used. If it would go further and limit the loans on those securities taken in connection with furthering the war the proposition would be a very different one from the one suggested by the Senator from New York, but if we put the whole insurance field and the banking field into the attitude of being invited to this bank for their relief whenever they need any you will demand an amount of capital and funds that this corporation can not possibly command.

Mr. CALDER. May I ask the Senator where will these concerns go for relief?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Where will I go? Where will a great many others go? Where will the great body of the people go?

Mr. CALDER. But the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am answering the Senator now, and I am not yielding.

Mr. CALDER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not proposed to take care of everything and everybody. That is utterly impossible in such a case as this. I think they ought to be left to take care of themselves, as the public generally will be left. I do not think it will do to say that every bank can come. We have limited the banks that are to come to paper which they have procured in connection with war industries.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to submit to the Senator from Georgia that his answer to the Senator from New York is not a good answer to the question. Where he would go would be to his bank, where his note would be readily taken; and then if his bank wished the funds, it would rediscount that note with the Federal reserve bank as provided for under the present law. This provides for a means of obtaining money by such corporation that can not obtain it in that way and that can not have their notes secured by collateral and rediscounted in the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is supposed the banks would use Federal reserve banks for their ordinary business, and they ought to so manage their business. They never had the Federal reserve bank until recently; they handled it through and among themselves. They have the Federal reserve bank now.

If we broadened the work of this corporation to any substantial extent beyond where it was first planned, I fear the consequences, unless the board of directors decline to make loans and decline to go into the field. Of course, it is only permissive; they are not compelled to do it. Unless they simply decline it, I am afraid we will exhaust its funds without its handling those more important responsibilities that seem so essential to be handled.

Mr. WEEKS. May I ask the Senator one more question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Assuming that there is to be a decent administration of this law, how would it be possible to do any harm? If a corporation of this kind did not need assistance, of course, the directors would not make the loan. I think the point made by the Senator from New York relating to insurance companies is extremely apt. We might have a great conflagration. The insurance company's funds are invested in bonds. It might not be possible, without a tremendous sacrifice, to sell the bonds to pay its losses. This would be a natural place for it to go.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so. In the first place, I hope we are not to have any very unusual conflagrations in the next 12 months such as are not incident to ordinary life. I do not think we have any reason to anticipate it. We have taken a great part of the burden off the life insurance companies by carrying the insurance of our soldiers in the National Treasury. Their war risks have largely been canceled and transferred to the Treasury Department, and there we have relieved the life insurance companies.

Now, as to the fire insurance companies, I do not see why they should have any special strain put upon them by reason of the war. I will state the difficulty I have in my mind. I am very much opposed to broadening the list of those who may come to this bank beyond what the bank can possibly do and leave the bank in any sense picking favorites of a class. I wish it to be strong enough to care for the classes we authorize it to handle. I do not mean this as any reflection, but human nature——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon me for one minute for an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the fire insurance companies have been among the very largest purchasers of Liberty bonds in this country, and I think the Government is looking to the large funds of the fire insurance companies for help in the next sale.

Mr. CALDER. Does not that apply to life insurance companies, too?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it applies to both. I think both have invested largely in Liberty bonds, and I do not think there is any reason why we should not include them, because I think we want to encourage them to make these purchases. Now, unless they can sell their securities in case their money runs very low they would have to be very guarded in making purchases in our sale of bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The run of the business of life insurance in the shape of loans is steady. I do not agree with the chairman. I do not believe it is wise to add them to the list.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CALDER. May I say to the Senator from Georgia that the life insurance companies operating in New York City have loaned something like $800,000,000 to policyholders alone, and unusual casualties in Europe may bring demands that these companies may have difficulty in meeting. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr SMITH of Georgia. No; I was simply listening to the Senator. I still do not agree with his view that it is wise to spread it to life insurance companies. We would simply carry it to cases where it can not meet the demand that we put it up against, and I think that is unwise.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I rose to make a suggestion to the Senator from Georgia, but as he has yielded and as the Chair has recognized me, I want to say a word upon this proposed amendment. Its terms are very broad. It proposes to extend the benefits of this measure to all corporations which are organized under the banking or insurance laws of any State. There are 48 States in the Union and, of course, there are as many banking and insurance laws as there are States. They vary very materially both as to the conditions under which corporations may be organized to do business under them and also as to the object for which such corporations may be organized. Take, for instance, the subject of insurance. Almost every conceivable subject to which insurance may relate has been covered in a greater or a less degree in some of the States of the Union.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. I am going to withdraw the amendment and offer an amendment merely relating to insurance companies. I thought I would advise the Senator of that fact.

Mr. THOMAS. It is the insurance feature of the Senator's amendment to which I want to address myself. We have companies organized to insure against hail, against floods, against pests of various kinds, automobile insurance, plate-glass insurance. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive of any subject against which insurance may be effected that is not provided for in some of the laws of the United States. Consequently, if an amendment of the character which has been offered or which has been contemplated, if this is withdrawn, should be incorporated in the bill, I think we should make a capital of $1,000,000,000 instead of $500,000,000. The demands that will be presented to the corporation, if the war continues indefinitely, will in consequence swamp any corporation with the amount of capital which is provided for in the bill. I do not think that we should do it.

I believe that subsection (d) of section 6 of the bill is sufficient to enable any corporation whose business is necessary or contributory to the war and which needs relief to present its application for relief to this bank corporation. Of course, the subsection to which I refer is intended as a kind of general clause to cover cases which might be found to be outside the pale of the provisions of sections (c) and (d). As it was stated by the Senator from Utah some time ago, if we are going to indefinitely enlarge by specific inclusions the terms and scope of sections (c) and (d), we should not stop at the corporations which will be covered by the proposed amendment of the Senator from New York. The corporations to which the Senator from Utah referred are corporations which are essential to the prosecution of the war. Let me say, Mr. President, that there is no legitimate business of any kind, character, or description which is productive or semiproductive in its character that does not contribute to the war and to which the Nation must not in some degree depend for the successful prosecution of the war.

As the Senator from Georgia stated, the purpose of the bill is not to help everybody and everything, although it does extend its provisions to those concerns which are contributory to the success of the war, because if we attempt to so enlarge the scope of the bill as to practically make it the equivalent of the territorial boundaries of the United States and every occupation which is carried on within our boundaries, then the Government will have undertaken a task which, powerful as it is, rich and resourceful as it is, it will be impossible to perform.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment and offer in lieu thereof the following.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. CALDER. On page 6, line 10, after the word "company," I move to insert "fire or life insurance company."

Mr. President, in response to the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] I will say that this amendment offered by me will be in connection with the language following—which has made, and which has outstanding, any loan or loans to any person, firm, corporation, or association whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war and evidenced by a note or notes—

And so forth. That seems to answer the objections made by him, for only those fire or insurance companies who would have loans as indicated can secure relief from the corporation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator modify it still further and provide that it shall only be with reference to said loans?

Mr. CALDER. I would prefer not to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from New York I would hesitate to offer the amendment the Senator has presented, because if his amendment is adopted the insurance companies will fall under paragraph (b) and not under paragraph (d), as now provided for. The conditions under paragraph (b) are much more drastic than under paragraph (d). Paragraph (d) is very broad in its provisions and advances made on remarkably easy terms. If there was a conflagration, as suggested by the Senator, that involved the financial standing of a fire insurance company and that would require it to raise a large amount of money in a very short time in order to pay the claims made against it, paragraph (d) covers just such cases, and under such cases the application for relief is not made to a bank but to the corporation itself, and the security required in order to obtain an advance would not necessarily be as much as required under subsections (b) and (c).

Now, let me call attention to the wording of it again:

To any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war.

Then there is a proviso added referring to such cases as cited by the Senator, as follows:

That such advances shall be made only in such cases as the board of directors in their discretion shall determine to be of exceptional importance in the public interest.

If there was a conflagration that threatened the financial existence of a fire insurance company, it seems to me it would be of great public interest that it be assisted, but if insurance companies are put under paragraph (b), along with banks and trust companies, such a company might be unable to furnish the required security. Paragraph (d) not only covers exceptional cases, but covers insurance companies that find themselves in need of assistance.

If I was interested in having the insurance companies, either life or fire, especially cared for, I would rather have them fall under paragraph (d) than paragraph (b).

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the Senator's amendment?

Mr. CALDER. To paragraph (b).

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 6?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; line 10 of the first print, after the word "company," to insert "fire or life insurance company."

Mr. President, all that the Senator from Utah says may be true. He has studied the bill and unquestionably he knows what he is talking about. But there can be no harm in inserting these words at the point I have offered them, and it may be the means of steadying these great fire and life insurance companies. For the benefit of the Senator I will say that the great life insurance companies of the country believe themselves that it is important that they should have this opportunity in case they become involved, and I am free to say that it was partly at their suggestion that I have offered the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

On a division the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I reserve the amendment for a separate vote in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reservation will be noted.

Mr. OWEN. I move to strike out, on page 11, line 5, the words "Such bonds may be dealt in by Federal reserve banks in the same manner and to the same extent as bonds or notes of the United States not bearing the circulation privilege, and."

Mr. President, I can explain that amendment in two or three minutes. In writing the Federal reserve act we authorized the member banks of the Federal Reserve System to use the gold reserve deposited with the Federal reserve banks in buying United States Government bonds. They have used that privilege to a moderate degree, but the issues of United States bonds are scattered among private holders, are in locked boxes, and are not very active on the market. This bill proposes to issue corporation bonds amounting to four thousand million dollars, and there will be a great pressure by New York business men and the New York banks to have the gold which is held as the reserve for the deposits of the member banks of the United States withdrawn for substitution by these bonds, and the directors of the Federal Reserve Board will have difficulty in resisting the urgency of the local demand in that respect. It is, in effect, an open-market operation that I am objecting to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. That question has not been brought to my attention, and I really would like to have the amendment go over until to-morrow morning. In the meantime I will look over the law as it is.

Mr. OWEN. I have no objection to the amendment going over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood the Senator from Oklahoma to speak of the reserves of the Federal reserve banks being put in United States bonds.

Mr. OWEN. I spoke of the reserves of member banks deposited in reserve banks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not catch the words "member banks," and I was just wondering if I were mistaken in supposing that those banks could not invest their reserves in anything, but must keep them in gold or lawful money.

Mr. OWEN. I said the reserves of member banks which are deposited in the reserve banks in gold ought not to be withdrawn for the bonds of the proposed war finance corporation. I will say incidentally that the committee of the House have already struck it out, and that the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives agrees with me that it ought to go out of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is right, but I should like to look it up to-night.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know of any other amendment likely to be presented.

Mr. OWEN. I have several others, and it will only take me a few minutes to present them. I think the Senator will be able to get through with this bill this evening, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Utah has asked that the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma go over, and I have uniformly deferred when I could do so to requests of that kind.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that there are a number of Senators who have left the Chamber within the last 15 minutes with the understanding that we would not reach a vote upon the bill to-night, and therefore I think it is only proper that the amendment should go over until to-morrow.

Mr. OWEN. I think the Senate is nearly ready to act on the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not be well to ask the Senator from Oklahoma to present, at least for the information of the Senate, such other amendments as he contemplates offering? So far as the amendment he has submitted is concerned, I have grasped it at once, and I am in perfect accord with it. I think it is a wise amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the amendment ought to be adopted; and, so far as I am personally concerned, I am perfectly willing that it shall be placed in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. If the present law is as stated by the Senator from Oklahoma, and, of course, I have no reason to doubt that it is, I myself think that his amendment ought to be adopted. I only thought at the time I should really like to look it up.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest to the Senator from Utah to let us act upon it. I am very anxious to get this bill out of the Committee of the Whole to-night. The amendment can be reconsidered to-morrow, if the Senator from Utah shall so desire.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the bill can not be gotten out of the Committee of the Whole to-night; that is impossible.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the Senator some amendments to offer?

Mr. HOLLIS. I have several; I think probably a dozen or 15.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. OWEN. I ask the Senator to withhold that motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withhold the motion.

Mr. OWEN. I send to the desk an amendment, to which I call the attention of the chairman of the committee. I wish to have it go into the RECORD. I do not intend to press it; but I want to put in the RECORD a view of what I think ought to be done in giving this relief. I only ask that the amendment be printed in the RECORD, and I will submit a few remarks on it in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. OWEN's proposed substitute is as follows:

That for the purpose of affording financial assistance, either directly or indirectly, to persons, firms corporations, and associations whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, in cases where such persons, firms, corporations, or associations shall be unable to procure funds on reasonable or practicable terms from the general public, or through the regular banking channels, and for the purpose of regulating and controlling the sale and offering for sale or subscription of securities hereafter issued, and for other purposes in aid of the prosecution of the war, the Secretary of the Treasury, together with four additional persons, shall comprise a war finance board (herein called the board).

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized through the board to advance to the Federal reserve banks an amount not exceeding $500,000,000, which amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Such advances shall be made to such Federal reserve banks as the fiscal agents of the United States to be used for the purposes herein set forth.

SEC. 3. The four members of the board shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Whenever a vacancy shall occur in the board, the person appointed to fill such vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired term. Three members of the board shall constitute a quorum. The term of office of the board shall end within one year from the termination of the war.

SEC. 4. The principal office of the board shall be located in the District of Columbia, but the board may have agents in any Federal reserve city.

SEC. 5. The four members of the board, appointed as hereinbefore provided, shall receive annual salaries, payable monthly, the amount of which shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President of the United States, not exceeding $12,000. The total compensation paid to any member as annual salary by the United States for any purpose shall not exceed $12,000. Of the four members appointed, as hereinbefore provided, the President of the United States shall designate two to serve for two years, and two for four years; and thereafter each member so appointed shall serve for a term of four years.

Any member shall be subject to removal by the President of the United States. Before entering upon his duties, each member shall take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office. Nothing contained in this act or in the Federal reserve act shall be construed to prevent the appointment of a member of the Federal Reserve Board or of any other governmental administrative body or of a director of a Federal reserve bank as a member of the board.

SEC. 6. The board shall be authorized to appoint and fix, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are not otherwise provided for in this act, to define their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and to dismiss any of them at pleasure.

The Secretary of the Treasury, upon the advice of the board, may make advances from the funds appropriated and the bonds authorized herein to any Federal reserve bank. Such Federal reserve bank shall open an account to be known as the "war finance fund" against such advances of funds and bonds. Out of the "war finance fund" such Federal reserve bank is authorized, subject to the approval of the board—

(a) To make advances, upon such terms not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances, (1) to any bank, banker, or trust company which has made, and which has outstanding, any loan or loans to any person, firm, corporation, or association whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war and evidenced by a note or notes, or (2) to any bank, banker, or trust company which has rendered financial assistance, directly or indirectly, to any such person, firm, corporation, or association by the purchase of its bonds or other obligations: Provided, That advances so made by the Federal reserve bank on the basis of any such loan or loans shall not exceed 75 per cent of the face value thereof: And provided, That any advances so made by the Federal reserve bank, in cases where such financial assistance shall have been rendered by the purchase of such bonds or other obligations, shall not exceed 75 per cent of the market value of such bonds or other obligations at the time of such advance, as estimated and determined by the Federal reserve bank: And provided further, That all such advances shall be made upon the promissory note or notes of such bank, banker, or trust company, secured by the notes, bonds, or other obligations, which are the basis of any such advance, together with all the securities, if any, which such bank, banker, or trust company may hold as collateral for such notes, bonds, or other obligations. The Federal reserve bank shall, however, have power to make advances up to 100 per cent of the face value of any such loan or loans made by any such bank, banker, or trust company to any such person, firm, corporation, or association, or up to 100 per cent of the market value at the time of such advances (as estimated and determined by the Federal reserve bank) of such bonds or other obligations by the purchase of which financial assistance shall have been rendered to such person, firm, corporation, or association: Provided, That every such advance shall be secured in the manner described in the preceding part of this paragraph, and in addition thereto by collateral security, to be furnished by the bank, banker, or trust company, of such character as shall be prescribed by the Federal reserve bank, of a market value, at the time of such advance, equal to at least 25 per cent of the amount advanced.

(b) To make advances from time to time, upon such terms, not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe, for periods not exceeding one year, to any savings bank or other banking institution which receives savings deposits, on the promissory note or notes of the borrowing institution whenever the Federal reserve bank shall deem such advances to be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war or important to the public interest: Provided, That such note or notes shall be secured by the pledge of securities of such character as shall be prescribed by the board with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the market value of which, at the time of such advance, as estimated and determined by the board, shall be equal in amount to at least 125 per cent of the amount of such advance: Provided further, That the rate of interest charged on any such advance shall not be less than 1 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the time of such advance at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrowing institution is located.

(c) To make advances directly (1) to any corporation owning or controlling (directly or through stock ownership) any railroad or other public utility, and (2) to any person, firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war: Provided, That such advances shall be made only in such cases as the board of directors in their discretion shall determine to be of exceptional importance in the public interest. Such advances may be made against securities of one and a third times the advance made and for periods not exceeding five years from the passage of this act, upon such terms and upon such adequate security and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

(d) To subscribe for, acquire and own, buy, sell, and deal in bonds and obligations of the United States to such extent as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine.

SEC. 7. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time United States war finance bonds in an amount aggregating not more than $1,000,000,000, such bonds to mature not less than one year nor more than five years from the respective dates of issue and to bear a rate of interest of 4 per cent per annum and to be redeemable before maturity at the option of the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such bonds shall be issued in terms of foreign money and sold American importers at par to the extent necessary for them to acquire foreign currency or foreign credits needed to cover their importations in countries whose currency is at a premium.

Such bonds may be issued at par in payment of any advances authorized by this act, or for any of the purposes of this act may be offered for sale publicly or to any individual, firm, association, or corporation at such price or prices, not less than par, as the board may determine, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 8. For the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of this war and providing for the public security and defense through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital issues committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board, which may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by such committee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate and license, or refuse to license, the sale or offering for sale or for subscription of securities, as hereinafter provided. Such committee shall, however, grant licenses for any such sale or any such offering for sale or for subscription which it shall determine to be consistent with the foregoing purposes. The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the compensation of the several members of such committee who are not members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be $7,500 per annum, to be paid by the board. Shares of stock of any corporation or association without nominal or par value shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be of the par value of $100 each. Issues of shares or securities heretofore made, only a part of which have been sold or disposed of prior to the approval of this act, shall not be affected thereby. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit, or to require any license from such committee in respect of, any borrowing by any person, firm, corporation, or association in the ordinary course of business as distinguished from borrowing for capital purposes. This section shall not be construed to apply to any securities issued by any railroad corporation the property of which may be in the possession and control of the President of the United States. This section shall not take effect until rules and regulations shall have been prescribed by such committee, as hereinbefore provided, and may continue in effect until the expiration of six months after the termination of the war, the date of such termination to be determined by a proclamation of the President of the United States. Nothing done or omitted by such committee hereunder shall be construed as carrying the approval of such committee or of the United States of the legality, validity, worth, or security of any securities.

SEC. 9. The war finance bonds shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, except (a) estate or inheritance taxes and (b) graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, and excess-profits and war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States, upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations. The interest on an amount of such bonds the principal of which does not exceed in the aggregate $5,000 owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation shall be exempt from the taxes provided for in subdivision (b) of this clause.

SEC. 10. The board shall make monthly reports to the Congress, giving the name and place of business of the person, firm, corporation, or association to which such advances have been made under the provisions of this act, the amount advanced, and the security accepted therefor.

SEC. 11. The term "securities," as used in this act, includes stocks, bonds, notes, certificates of indebtedness, and other obligations.

SEC. 12. The right to amend, alter, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. OWEN. Now I move, on page 11, line 5, after the words "Secretary of the Treasury," to insert as a new sentence the words "Such bonds shall be issued in terms of foreign money and sold to American importers at par to the extent necessary to cover their importations from countries whose currency is at a premium." I will explain that in the morning, if it needs any explanation. It will par the American gold dollar.

On page 11, where the language reads "Federal reserve banks shall be authorized, subject to the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to rediscount and purchase paper and make advances secured by such bonds in the same manner and to the same extent and at the same rate or at such higher rates as the Federal Reserve Board may approve," I wish to insert as an amendment the words "at not less than 1 per cent in excess of the interest rate fixed upon commercial paper by the Federal Reserve Board in that district."

I will consider that to-morrow, but I do not wish to take any time in discussing it now, and I do not want to delay the Senate in its adjournment. I have nothing further to offer.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], pending which the Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 7, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 6, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. [illegible]den, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We stand in Thy holy presence, O God, our heavenly Father, with bowed heads and open hearts, that we may receive of Thine infinite wisdom, power, and goodness sufficient unto the needs of the hour; that we may be wise in our conceptions, strong in our convictions, firm in our purposes; that the work of this day may be well pleasing in Thy sight and conducive to the best interests of mankind; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PNEUMATIC-TUBE SERVICE.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a minority report of the Commission to Investigate the Pneumatic-Tube Service, and I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky presents a minority report of the Pneumatic-Tube Service Commission and asks that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CANNON. Was the other report printed in the RECORD?

Mr. ROUSE. The majority report has been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It was printed by the gentleman getting time in debate and extending it in his remarks.

Mr. ROUSE. I did it in that way because I did not want to use that time.

Mr. MADDEN. Inasmuch as the other report is in, let this go in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire how lengthy is the report of the minority views.

Mr. ROUSE. It is about 70 pages.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, that is entirely too cumbersome a report to load down the RECORD with, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. ROUSE. Then I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the report be printed in the RECORD. It is only about 14 typewritten pages.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that a summary of the report be printed. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the summary been prepared?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the summary referred to:

MINORITY REPORT OF THE COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE THE PNEUMATIC-TUBE SERVICE.

This commission was created for specific purposes. Its duties were clearly defined by the Congress. It had an opportunity to render a service of great value but, in my judgment, failed to do so.

The act creating the commission directed that it should:

"(a) Investigate the value of the pneumatic-tube service."

In prosecuting its investigation in compliance with this direction the commission did not summon before it a single expert postal official to ascertain his views and judgment as to the value of the pneumatic tubes. In neglecting to do so the commission failed to obtain at first hand the judgment of the only men qualified by experience and technical knowledge of the Postal Service to pass intelligently on this subject. The commission employed Stone & Webster, consulting engineers of Boston, Mass., to investigate the utility value of the pneumatic tubes. There is no evidence that any person connected with this firm has any technical knowledge of the postal methods and necessities of the present day.

In making their investigations the representatives of Stone & Webster did not confer with any person connected with the Post Office Department, neither does their report indicate that they obtained the judgment of responsible persons at the post offices where the tubes are operated as to the utility value of the tubes. It must be conceded that those in daily contact with the tubes and who are responsible for the expeditious handling of the mails are best qualified to testify to the value of the tubes as a mail-carrying device. This was fully recognized in the early history of the tubes. The Search Commission, of which S. C. Mead, now secretary of the Merchants' Association of New York City, was a member, and which considered the question as to whether the pneumatic tubes should be owned, leased, or discontinued by the Government, in its report of December 20, 1900, stated:

"The Government, through its responsible officials, should be the final judge of the extent of ultimate adoption [of the tubes]."

The Congress fully recognized the value of the judgment of experienced postal officials in this matter and would not even trust the Postmaster General to pass on the value of the pneumatic-tube service, because he might lack expert and scientific postal knowledge, but required by the act of April 21, 1902—

"That no advertisement shall issue until after a careful investigation shall have been made as to the needs and practicability of such service and until a favorable report, in writing, shall have been submitted to the Postmaster General by a commission of not less than three expert postal officials to be named by him."

This act applies to the pneumatic-tube service only and has never been repealed.

The commission was further directed to ascertain—

"(b) The value of the tubes, franchises, and other equipment with a view to the purchase or operation of the same or any portion thereof by the Government."

The commission made no investigation to determine the present physical condition of the properties of the pneumatic-tube companies, and so can not state their value. With reference to the franchises, the commission appointed in accordance with the provision of the act of August 24, 1912, employed Mr. Nathan B. Williams, a well-known attorney, to look into and report on their duration, and his report is, in part, as follows:

"Boston occupies all streets, revocable on order of city council."

"New York, 25 years, from 1897." This franchise will expire in 1922, or four years hence.

"Chicago, 20 years, from October 12, 1903, with right of purchase after October 12, 1913." This franchise expires in 1923, and under its provision the property reverts to the city of Chicago.

"St. Louis, 25 years, presumably from June 10, 1903." This franchise will therefore expire in June, 1928.

"Philadelphia, no terms."

In connection with this franchise, however, attention is called to section 12 of an ordinance regulating the laying and construction of underground wires, electrical conductor, conduits, cables, or tubes, approved the 5th day of August, 1886, which was submitted by Mr. Williams, and which reads as follows:

"Should any company, corporation, firm, or individual to which privileges have heretofore or shall hereafter be granted for the laying of underground wires, electrical conductors, conduits, cables, or tubes, dispose of any of the franchises granted by ordinance, or lease to, consolidate, or merge with any other company, corporation, firm, or individual, they shall forfeit all rights and privileges granted to them by the city of Philadelphia, and upon satisfactory proof being furnished to the chief of the electrical department and the city solicitor, they are hereby authorized and directed to take similar action against the offending company, corporation, firm, or individual, as provided for in section 9 of this ordinance."

With respect to keeping the streets in repair, the franchises for the different cities require, according to the report of Mr. Williams:

"Boston: Person opening surface of street must make repairs for 12 months.

"New York: Streets must be restored and maintained.

"Chicago: Deposit covering estimates for repair costs must be maintained.

"St. Louis: Deposit covering estimates for repair costs must be maintained.

"Philadelphia: Repairs must be maintained for three years."

For the Government to spend millions of dollars to purchase tube systems operating under franchises which will expire within such a short period of time would be indefensible, as in one instance the property will revert to the city upon the expiration of the franchise and in another all rights and privileges granted by the city shall be forfeited upon sale. No business man would think of spending a dollar of his own money under like circumstances and surely we should not vote to squander the money of the public under circumstances where we would not be willing to spend our own.

The commission was also directed to:

"(c) Ascertain the cost and terms upon which such purchase may be made."

While the commission has not determined the cost of the tubes, the majority report outlines a method of payment which is clearly impracticable. After payment of the interest on deferred payments it is proposed to deduct the costs of operation from the amount now appropriated for rental and to apply the difference to the purchase. In my judgment after the interest and operating cost and proper charges as such there will be little or nothing left to apply to the purchase of the tubes and they will be worn out long before final payment can be made. In justice to the pneumatic-tube companies, and if their properties are to be purchased they should know how and when they are to be paid. In justice to the public if Government funds are to be used for that purpose they should know the extent of the cost.

The evidence before it and upon which the commission must base its conclusions consists of the testimony of representatives of commercial and civic organizations, the report of Stone & Webster, the briefs of the pneumatic-tube companies and of the Post Office Department, together with the accompanying exhibits.

I wish every Member of Congress would read the report of the departmental commission of 1916, the brief of the department, the report of the Post Office inspectors, and the report of the various postmasters and supervisory officials (pages 64 to 241, Briefs and Data) that they might comprehend the question from the clear, concise reasoning of broadminded men, men of experience and technical knowledge of the Postal Service and who, when they discuss postal affairs, know what they talk about.

These reports analyze the service in the minutest detail. The statements and conclusions contained therein are fully supported by facts. They are unanswerable and clearly disprove the arguments of the owners that the tubes are efficient and necessary to the Postal Service. This being true, the companies now resort to personal abuse and generalities to effect the sale of the tubes to the Government.

In reviewing the data before the commission the most careful consideration must necessarily be given to the respective interests of the parties involved. The owners of the tubes are in no wise responsible for the efficiency or conduct of the Postal Service. They are, however, vitally interested, from a selfish standpoint, in disposing of their property to the Government. They have inspired every possible sentiment to enable them to consummate this end. On the other hand, the Post Office Department, upon which rests the responsibility for efficiency in the Postal Service, must of necessity be vitally interested in procuring utilities best adapted to postal needs. The majority of the commission have entirely waived aside the facts presented by the department, as well as the judgment of the ablest men in the Postal Service. They have accepted instead the statements of the pneumatic tube owners and such inspired testimony as the latter, through hired agents, have been able to procure. If this commission questioned the judgment of the postal officials subscribing to the brief and reports of the Post Office Department and postal officials (pp. 64–241, Briefs and Data) it was clearly its duty to summon these officials and ascertain the facts upon which their opinions and conclusions were based and to determine the value of their judgment. These officials expected to be called before the commission and be so examined, and the fact is that the department urged that this be done.

While many investigations have been made of the pneumatic tubes by expert postal officials, only one of such officials recommended that the Government purchase the tubes. He served on two commissions within a short period of time and recommended both ways, once against and once for the purchase of the tubes.

In referring to the Postal Service the majority report states:

"The policy of those responsible for efficient management should be, however, to keep pace with the growth and the development of the country and the necessity for a constantly improved service."

This policy is sound in principle, and the Post Office Department urges that it be permitted to follow it in practice. This commission can not expect the Post Office Department to keep pace with the growth and development of the country and meet the demands for a constantly improved service if compelled by Congress to use antiquated and obsolete devices.

This commission fully appreciates the importance of letter mail and the necessity for its expeditious handling. The majority report states:

"The records of the Post Office Department indicate that from three to five million letters are advanced in delivery each day by the tubes, which otherwise would be delayed. The commission feels that the additional cost for providing expedition for this amount of mail is fully justified. The engineers for the commission estimate that the expense of tube service and Government ownership to supplant the necessary automobile service to replace the tubes if discontinued would be about $312 a day. The commission concludes that for this sum Congress can well afford to provide this special service for three to five million letters daily that would be enabled thereby to reach their destination earlier, which otherwise would not be true if tube service were dispensed with."

On this statement is based the recommendation for the purchase of the tubes.

It may be true that from three to five million letters are now advanced in delivery each day by the tubes, but in view of the evidence before the commission it is not justified in assuming that these letters will be delayed if the use of the tubes is abandoned, because the department proposes to handle them more expeditiously by other means. The report of the departmental commission, dated October 13, 1916, page 12, states:

"The statements and reports heretofore prepared by different commissions on pneumatic tubes show the number of pieces of mail advanced by the use of the tubes. This should not be construed to mean that if the tubes were displaced the same quantity of mail would be delayed, for the reason that the existing screen-wagon schedules are so arranged as to permit of the greatest possible use of the pneumatic-tube service for the dispatch of letter mail."

The representatives of the department contended, when appearing before committees of Congress, that by rearrangement of the automobile schedules and by supplementing them with additional trips that practically all of the mail then advanced by tubes could have been handled without delay, and that much of the mail then delayed by the tubes advanced. They also showed how that later dispatches could be made by automobile than were being made by the pneumatic tubes. Experience has demonstrated that this claim was true. In the report of the investigation of the New York service (p. 82, Briefs and Data) it is stated:

"During the latter part of 1916 an investigation was made into the cause of the failure to dispatch mail for Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia to the train above referred to, a considerable portion of which was postmarked at Madison Square Station. At that time the closing for the last wagon to this train, which leaves the Pennsylvania Terminal Station at 9.45 p. m., was 8.48 p. m., while the closing for the tube to the same train was 8.53 p. m. Our investigation showed that the dispatch of mail to this train was jeopardized when placed in the tube containers at 8.53 p. m., and that the connection frequently was missed. Following our investigation a wagon, known as trip 155, was scheduled to leave Station D at 9.07 p. m., Madison Square Station at 9.18 p. m., and Station F at 9.27 p. m., arriving at the Pennsylvania Terminal Station with closing mail from those stations for train 139, above mentioned. The previous closing time of the tube for this train at Station D was 8.50 p. m., a difference in favor of the wagon of 17 minutes; Madison Square at 8.53 p. m., a difference of 25 minutes; and Station F at 8.50 p. m., a difference of 37 minutes. The records show that the wagon is regularly making the connection, whereas the connection at that hour by the tube was very uncertain. We cite this instance from the fact that this wagon was scheduled especially to make this connection, the tube service being undependable.

"In the event a complete wagon system is inaugurated, wagons for closings for the heavier connections would be scheduled from the other stations accordingly. It is unfair to compare the present schedules of wagon service with the tube closings for connections with trains, as, due to the fact that the tube service is maintained, the wagons have not been scheduled to provide for the transfer of final dispatches, but for the handling of the heavier and more bulky mail. In fact, heavy trucks are used, whereas if dispatches of first-class mail were dependent upon the operation of wagons lighter and more rapidly moving vehicles would be used. The conditions above described would substantially obtain under a complete system of wagon service, and while in some instances of longer hauls a small amount of time would be lost, the greater volume of the mail would be correspondingly advanced."

The postmaster at Philadelphia states (p. 136, Briefs and Data):

"In summing up the comparative merits of the pneumatic-tube system and any other means for the transportation of mails, consideration should be given to the essential features, which are speed, reliability, and cost.

"It has been shown that 4,297 letters are advanced in delivery by tube service, but this advantage is offset by the more expeditious delivery of special-delivery parcels and large packages of first-class mail which the increased automobile service would give."

Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, of Chicago, a distinguished Member of this Congress, who is ever zealous in guarding the interests and efficiency of the Postal Service and whose judgment in matters of postal affairs is eagerly sought, stated, on page 366 of the hearings before the Post Office Committee in December, 1913:

"Mr. MADDEN. Would you be surprised to know that an investigation that I made of the pneumatic-tube service in Chicago led me to the conclusion that it was a service of no special value, except in the matter of the 12 minutes' time saved in closing the mail; that they would have to close 12 minutes earlier if they did not use the service; but that all mail sent through the pneumatic tubes from the office to the railway stations had to be broken up and be put in small packages in order to put it through the tubes at all, and then it had to be redistributed for transportation over the railroad at a cost of $60,000? A number of clerks sufficient to consume $60,000 a year in pay had to be maintained to put that mail back into form. Perhaps it might surprise you to be told that I could take a wheelbarrow from the main post office and start up to any of the ordinary railroad stations with it and load it in and get it mailed on the train as quick as the pneumatic-tube service, taking the time for redistribution into consideration."

What has been demonstrated to be true in New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago is equally true in the other cities where the tubes are operated. This clearly demonstrates that but few of the letters referred to by the commission will be delayed. It also clearly demonstrates that many letters now delayed through the use of the tubes can be materially advanced. The conclusions in the majority report, being based on false assumption, must naturally fall of their own weight.

It is the judgment of postal officials who are in daily contact with the tube service that it is of so little value as a postal utility that if tendered the department as a gift it would not be justified in asking the Congress for funds to operate it. Their judgment in this respect appears to be in accord with that of Congress with regard to pneumatic tubes, because the Congress itself fails to operate the tube which connects the Capitol with the House Office Building, although it is of much larger diameter than the tubes used in the Postal Service. Even the merchants of Boston abandoned more than 15 years ago a tube installed in that city for commercial purposes, and the most expert postal officials and engineers of Great Britain, after a thorough investigation of the tube system installed in this country, recommended to their Government against its adoption, and stated that it possessed no advantage as a means of transporting mail over the ordinary road van.

The conclusions in the majority report, in my judgment, are not justified for the following reasons:

First. Because they are not in accordance with the facts. When viewed in the most charitable manner, the data before the commission do not justify the purchase, retention, or operation of the tubes.

Second. The expenditure of millions of dollars by the Government to purchase the present pneumatic-tube equipment, which the postal officials state is inefficient, antiquated, and worn out, and of so little value that it would not be accepted as a gift, can not be justified.

Third. To compel the department by law to continue the use of these tubes which delay millions of letters annually and damage and destroy thousands of others would be indefensible.

Fourth. The purchase by the Government of the present tube systems, with tubes of various sizes, operating under franchises which are either revocable or which will expire long before final payment can be made, and in one instance which will revert to the city at the expiration of the franchise, would be little short of scandalous, and will justly deserve the condemnation of the public.

Fifth. The purchase of approximately 5 miles of pneumatic tubes which were abandoned as a commercial failure, and for which the Government has already paid a rental far in excess of the original cost to the tube company, is preposterous.

Sixth. The proposed method of payment for the tubes outlined in the majority report is but a weak attempt to justify and camouflage an extravagant waste of public funds at a time when the Government must sell liberty bonds and greatly increase taxes to secure funds to successfully prosecute the war.

Seventh. To ignore the facts presented and the judgment of eminently qualified postal experts not only of the United States but of Great Britain, and yield to the importunities of those financially interested and the inspired sentiment created by professional boosters who have no intimate knowledge of the service or responsibility for its successful operation would also be indefensible.

It is admitted by the owners of the pneumatic tubes that the Government is not under the slightest moral obligation to purchase or continue their use. In view of their inefficiency, and the destruction, damage, and delay which they cause to an enormous quantity of letters, I can not too strongly urge that the present tube systems be not only not purchased by the Government but that their use be discontinued entirely. I wish to state, however, that I am very much in favor of an underground system which will transport all mail of all classes in the congested districts of large cities, but I am not in favor of the purchase by the Government of an obsolete toy, which the present pneumatic-tube system is.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the list of committees.

The Committee on the Judiciary was called.

TO PUNISH DESTRUCTION OF WAR MATERIAL.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to call up Senate bill 383, House Calendar No. 4, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 383) to punish the destruction or injuring of war material and war transportation facilities by fire, explosives, or other violent means, and to forbid hostile use of property during time of war, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the committee, I desire to offer a committee substitute for Senate bill 383 and have it read at this time for discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a committee substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to punish the willful injury or destruction of war material, or of war premises or utilities used in connection with war material, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the words "war material," as used herein, shall include arms, armament, ammunition, clothing, food, supplies, stores, and all other articles of whatever description intended to be used by the United States, or any associate nation, in connection with the conduct of the war.

The words "war premises," as used herein, shall include all buildings, grounds, mines, or other places wherein such war material is being produced, manufactured, repaired, stored, mined, extracted, distributed, loaded, unloaded, or transported, together with all machinery and appliances therein contained; and all forts, arsenals, navy yards, camps, prisons, or other military or naval stations of the United States, or any associate nation.

The words "war utilities," as used herein, shall include all railroads, railways, electric lines, roads of whatever description, railroad or railway fixture, canal, lock, dam, wharf, pier, dock, bridge, building, structure, engine, machine, mechanical contrivance, car, vehicle, boat, or aircraft, or any other means of transportation whatsoever, whereon or whereby such war material or any troops of the United States, or of any associate nation, are being or about to be transported either within the limits of the United States or upon the high seas; and all dams, reservoirs, aqueducts, water and gas mains and pipes, structures and buildings, whereby or in connection with which water or gas is being furnished to the military or naval forces of the United States or any associate nation, and all electric light and power, steam or pneumatic power, telephone and telegraph plants, poles, wires, and fixtures and wireless stations, and the buildings connected with the maintenance and operation thereof used to supply water, light, heat, power, or facilities of communication to the military or naval forces of the United States, or any associate nation.

The words "United States" shall include the Canal Zone and all territory and waters, continental and insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

The words "associate nation," as used in this act, shall be deemed to mean any nation at war with any nation with which the United States is at war.

SEC. 2. That when the United States is at war, whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, or whoever, with reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall willfully injure or destroy, or shall attempt to so injure or destroy, any war material, war premises, or war utilities, as herein defined, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 30 years, or both.

SEC. 3. That when the United States is at war, whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, or whoever, with reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall willfully make or cause to be made in a defective manner, or attempt to make or cause to be made in a defective manner, any war material, as herein defined, or any tool, implement, machine, utensil, or receptacle used or employed in making, producing, manufacturing, or repairing any such war material, as herein defined, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 30 years, or both.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina desire to ask leave to consider the substitute for the Senate bill?

Mr. WEBB. I desire to offer the substitute in lieu of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to consider the committee substitute in lieu of the Senate bill. Of course, the time has not come to offer the substitute, but the Chair wants to warn the House that it is a House substitute for the Senate bill that the gentleman desires to discuss.

Mr. WEBB. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has 45 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] 45 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was before the House on a Calendar Wednesday last April a number of gentlemen, among them our esteemed friend, the honored Republican floor leader [Mr. MANN], interposed very serious objections to certain language which was in the Senate bill, and it was seriously objected to by a number of Members. The language which at that time seemed to be most objectionable to those gentlemen was this, as found in lines 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 in the Senate bill:

And all other articles of whatever description requisite to or intended to be used in connection with the conduct of war by the United States, as well as all machinery and other articles and accessories required for or connected with the production or manufacture of such war material.

The words "requisite to" seemed to cause most debate and most objection. The objections of those gentlemen ran to the Senate bill entirely.

We did not finish the bill on that day, and the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary asked a special subcommittee to go over the Senate bill, which was reported hastily, I may say, and they proposed a substitute. The substitute that we now offer I think very largely eliminates that objection.

My recollection is that there was another objection which the debate did not fully develop, which was that it made the defendant guilty of a crime if he injured or destroyed by fire or other violent means either war materials or war utilities or war premises without requiring any evidence to show that he knew that they were war materials or war premises or utilities, or that he intended to obstruct the operations of the war, so that the committee in the substitute provides that whoever in time of war, with intent to injure, hinder, or delay the prosecution of the war, or whoever, with reason to believe that his act would hinder, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, even if not by violence or explosion, injures or destroys any war materials or war utilities, shall be guilty of a crime.

In one sense we have restricted the bill a little and in another broadened it. It seemed that the words "requisite to" were objected to on the ground that they might cover anything that might possibly be used directly or indirectly to prosecute the war. It might cover corn or wheat in the fields, growing or otherwise, and, of course, the committee did not want to make it too broad. At the same time, they wanted to make it broad enough to cover anybody who would try to prevent or delay or hinder the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. MADDEN rose.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, this gives any person charged with a crime described in this bill the right to a defense, to prove his case if he is innocent?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, absolutely. This is a civil bill and will be enforced by the civil court.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it can be too drastic myself. If we are in this war to win, we have got to provide the means to win, and we must surround the Government with every safeguard to enable it to carry out the functions that devolve upon us by reason of the fact that we are in the war. Personally I believe that the committee have done a good job, and there ought not to be any question about the adoption of this bill without debate, it seems to me.

Mr. WEBB. I thank the gentleman. If there is any further question about the substitute, I will be glad to try to answer it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. ROBBINS. This bill applies to Government property. It does not apply to private property.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes; it does apply to all sorts of property if it is intended to be used in the prosecution of the war.

Mr. ROBBINS. Would it apply to works like the Westinghouse works, near Pittsburgh, if they are engaged in the manufacture of munitions.

Mr. MADDEN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ROBBINS. These works have been burned down, and there have been explosions in them, all of which have been believed to be because they were engaged in the manufacture of munitions; but they are privately owned property, not under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. WEBB. Let me read to the gentleman the definition of war premises:

> The words "war premises," as used herein, shall include all buildings, grounds, mines, or other places wherein such war material is being produced, manufactured, repaired, stored, mined, extracted, distributed, loaded, unloaded, or transported, together with all machinery and appliances therein contained; and all forts, arsenals, navy yards, camps, prisons, or other military or naval stations of the United States, or any associate nation.

Mr. ROBBINS. That description is quite broad, but would it yet include a privately-owned manufacturing concern engaged in the manufacture of munitions?

Mr. WEBB. I imagine a privately-owned manufacturing concern "wherein such war material is being produced, manufactured, repaired, or stored," intended for the use of the United States, would be covered by this bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. I think it should be broad enough to cover these cases.

Mr. WEBB. We are perfectly willing to make it as broad as necessary, and if the gentleman can make any suggestion we shall be glad to consider it. This is practically the language suggested by the Attorney General. We have taken practically his definition of war premises.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will yield, I will say that there is not any question but what the committee wants to include all matters of that kind.

Mr. WEBB. That is correct.

Mr. DYER. And it seems to me that that definition is ample for the purpose that the gentleman has referred to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. In hastily glancing over this bill I notice that it is much broader and more drastic than the original bill that we considered here some months ago.

Mr. WEBB. As I said in my opening statement, in one respect it restricts and in another respect it is a little broader, because the Senate bill provided that a man could only be punished when he committed some of these offenses by some violent means—by fire or explosion. We provide that he shall be punished if he injures or destroys any of these war utilities or premises, whether by violent means or not. We thought that a man who deliberately, with intent to delay the prosecution of the war, injured any utilities which were described in this substitute, which manifestly are necessary for the prosecution of the war, and did it with intent to injure or delay, or with the knowledge or belief that it may injure or delay the prosecution of the war, ought to be punished.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. If my friend from Wisconsin has concluded his remarks, I will yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I observe that the penalty fixed in the act is only fine or imprisonment. Suppose these acts result, as they frequently do, and have during the last few months, in the death of one or more persons; do you not think there ought to be some provision by which the death penalty could be inflicted in a case of that kind?

Mr. WEBB. The difficulty heretofore, as I understand, has been in apprehending the guilty person. If in any State of the Union a man blows up a building, and in blowing it up kills some one, he is liable to be hanged under the State law. This bill will put it in the power of the Government to run down and apprehend violators of this act.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. And this is a remedy which is additional to what the State has against these very same offenses. We are defining offenses which are now punishable under the State laws, also offenses against the Government of the United States. We have not covered the death penalty; but we thought if we covered the others, then if the Government catches a man who actually committed any offense of this kind under the circumstances the gentleman suggests the State would probably hang him, and properly so.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill in its phraseology would not prevent labor from striking to redress any grievances that they might conceive they had——

Mr. WEBB. Not unless——

Mr. STAFFORD. In case that labor was employed in the manufacture of munitions or articles necessary for carrying on the war.

Mr. WEBB. No; not unless labor injured these war utilities by a combination whose intent was to delay the prosecution of the war.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman mean to say that a man who was working in one of these factories, a laborer who wants to go on a strike and does go on a strike, is to have any privileges that are not accorded to any other citizen under this proposed bill?

Mr. WEBB. Of course I do not say that. If a man strikes and injures war utilities or war premises as a striker, and does that with intent to delay or interfere with the prosecution of the war, he would be just as guilty as anybody else who does not labor, and of course he ought to be.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. Section 1, page 2, lines 6 and 7, war utilities, is defined in the bill to comprehend "railroad or railway fixture." Now, suppose in the course of a strike some railway fixture were injured with intent to injure the railroad company, but not with an intent to interfere with the prosecution of this war. In that event the striker would not be liable, unless he had reason to believe that his act would interfere with the prosecution of the war.

Mr. WEBB. That is why we have two offenses in the bill; one, if he knowingly interferes with the prosecution of the war he is guilty of a crime, and, secondly, if he does an act with reasonable ground to believe that it will interfere with the prosecution of the war, that makes him guilty, too.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to direct the gentleman's attention to section 2, as I believe the phraseology is broad enough to make it a crime under this bill in case the striker destroys property of the railroad company with the intention to gain his means of winning the strike. If it in any wise affects the dispatch of the war under that section, he would be guilty of a crime.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman from North Carolina permit me to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Under clause 2 of this bill the provision is as follows:

SEC. 2. That when the United States is at war, whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, or whoever, with reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall wilifully injure or destroy, or shall attempt to so injure or destroy, any war material, war premises, or war utilities, as herein defined, shall—

And so forth.

Now, if the act of the striker is done without an intent to interfere with the prosecution of the war, and without reason to believe that it would so interfere with the prosecution of the war, he is not amenable to this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who determines that?

Mr. REAVIS. That is a question of fact for the jury.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; it is for the jury, of course; but it occurs to me that under the drastic language of the section the case of the striker instanced by the gentleman from Nebraska would be liable.

Mr. WEBB. The striker's body is no more sacred than the body of anybody else.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I understood the gentleman to say that he would not be liable.

Mr. WEBB. I did not say that he would not be liable; I said he would be if he commits the acts denounced in the bill, just the same as anyone else.

Mr. REAVIS. Would the gentleman be in favor of acquitting a striker who did an act with reason to believe that it would interfere with the prosecution of the war?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not; but I say that under the phraseology, under a strict construction, he would be guilty of a crime in the case instanced by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. I can not agree with the gentleman in the absence of an intent or something to put him on notice of the fact that he was interfering with the prosecution of the war.

Mr. WEBB. I will say that if the striker should throw a bomb into a munition plant, in which he had been at work, for the purpose of blowing up and killing or injuring the man for whom he is at work, he would be guilty under this bill, if the jury should find, and, of course, it would find without any hesitation, that he had reason to believe that blowing up the factory would interfere with the prosecution of the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no one in this Chamber who does not wish to punish that character of man to the greatest extent, and not only give State authorities the jurisdiction which they now have, but give national authority to prosecute such act.

Mr. WEBB. I am glad the gentleman has interjected the question, because I want it understood that the striker can not violate the law more than anybody else can violate it.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman states if a striker throws a bomb for the purpose of blowing up a factory he would be guilty.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Would the Government be required to show that he had the purpose in blowing up the factory when he knows that the bomb would be likely to blow it up?

Mr. WEBB. No.

Mr. RUCKER. If he throws a bomb, regardless of any purpose, he ought to be guilty.

Mr. WEBB. We do make him guilty if he has reason to believe that destruction would retard the prosecution of the war.

Mr. RUCKER. A man must be held to be responsible for the ordinary consequences of his act. If he throws a bomb into a munition factory, the natural and usual consequence would be to delay it, and he must be held responsible for it.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; even if the bomb did not explode, if he made the attempt he would be guilty under this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is now discussing the House substitute?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I have not had my attention directed to the House substitute, and therefore what I say is rathe a hop, skip, and a jump. When the President addressed the Congress before the Adamson bill passed he recommended the bill, as I recollect it, and for which I voted. In his address he also favored, in substance, legislation that when a dispute arose about wages between employers and employees it should be arbitrated, and pending arbitration it should be unlawful not for one man to quit his job, but unlawful to strike in pursuance of a conspiracy, until the award was made, and when made the award should be made a judgment of the court. Now, is there anything in this act or in any other bill pending that would tend to prevent these strikes until there was arbitration and the arbitration made the judgment of the court?

Mr. WEBB. As far as my knowledge is concerned, I will say that I know of no bill pending before the Judiciary Committee along the line of the gentleman's suggestion that would squarely and simply prevent men from striking under any circumstances. Such bill may be pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. However, I do not know of any such bill. That committee might have jurisdiction of it, as it had jurisdiction of the Adamson railroad bill. I do not know whether such proposed legislation is pending or not.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will permit me, in connection with the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], would not that bill have this effect? Section 2 reads:

That when the United States is at war whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war—

A strike would not come within that provision.

Mr. WEBB. No; unless the strikers have the intent to interfere with the prosecution of the war and injure or destroy some class of property defined in the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. But that is preliminary. It continues—or whoever, with reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war.

Now, if men employed in a munition factory, for instance, should by common consent agree to strike, would not they have reason to believe that their conduct would interfere with and obstruct the United States in preparing for the war and carrying on the war? In other words, would not that act come within the provisions of this substitute?

Mr. WEBB. Their act would have to be accompanied by willful injury or destruction of some of the property described in the bill. If they committed that sort of act with intent or reasonable ground to believe the act would delay the United States in the prosecution of the war, then they would be guilty under this bill, but the mere fact of a peaceable strike, without some accompanying injury and without intent to injure the United States in the war, would not I think be covered by this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman perhaps is right about that, but the way the substitute is punctuated it would seem to me to stand alone and to be somewhat disconnected from the provision of the substitute which the gentleman has just quoted.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that in section 2 there are two offenses defined.

Mr. HAMLIN. Are there not three? That is the point I am making. The first is, "whoever shall interfere with intent to injure or obstruct."

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. The second is, "Whoever with reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere, or obstruct the United States or associate nations in preparing or carrying on the war," and then the third is, "whoever shall willfully injure or obstruct."

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no. Now, you come to the predicate of that whole sentence—"whoever with intent or with reasonable ground to believe shall destroy," and so forth.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the point I want to have clear.

Mr. CANNON. Would the gentleman accept or himself offer an amendment which during the war would prevent conspiracies to strike? Evidently there have been conspiracies, especially on the Pacific coast and elsewhere. Would the gentleman object to an amendment or offer an amendment himself—he could do it better than I—that would substantially put upon the statute books the recommendations of the President when we passed the Adamson law and which he repeated in his annual message?

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that that is a tremendous question, as he knows, and I would not undertake to draw an amendment in a moment to cover the question. I imagine that when such bill does come to the House, if it comes at all, that the committee which handled the Adamson law will probably be requested to handle such bill.

Mr. CANNON. But this matter I speak of would not be in conference in the event the House adopts the substitute.

Mr. WEBB. If this bill goes to the Senate, the Senate can add to our substitute, and then both Senate bill and our substitute would be in conference.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; they could agree to our substitute with an amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. But suppose the Senate does not do that?

Mr. WEBB. Then we have only the House substitute.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman think it would be well to put in the conference a provision, which could be drafted readily, I think?

Mr. WEBB. I can not tell. I do not know whether that sort of an amendment right now would do more harm than good. These heads of the departments who are in closer touch with the labor situation than I am might be better judges about it. Of course, I do not think labor ought to be permitted to conspire to do anything with intent to injure the conduct of the war.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I want to state with reference to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that I doubt the advisability of attempting to amend this bill with such an amendment. That is too great and too important a matter, and it ought to be very carefully studied. England has enacted a law along the lines suggested by the gentleman from Illinois in the munitions act, and in effect strikes are not permitted there. They must submit their grievances and they are considered by a board of arbitration, and so forth. The matter would have to be very carefully drawn and carefully considered by the committee before it should be brought to the House, and I think it would be unwise to attach it to this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me in his time, as a war measure, during the war, it seems to me that it is vital and patriotic both that that legislation should be enacted.

Mr. WEBB. Of course, as far as I am concerned, I expect the labor people of the country, through their duly elected spokesman—Mr Gompers—to be loyal to the Government and not to have any useless strikes, or even strikes that appear to be useful, if in so doing the progress of the war will be retarded.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman think that Mr. Gompers has the power to control the I. W. W.?

Mr. WEBB. No; nobody can control them.

Mr. DYER. Shot guns.

Mr. CANNON. Therefore, they have had the power so far to raise hell.

And now it seems to me, as a war measure—I am not going to speak about it as peace legislation—but as a war measure it could not hurt Mr. Gompers's organization whatever he might believe in time of peace should be the legislation, but whether it hurt or not, it seems to me that this legislation should cover everybody who conspires along the line of which I have spoken.

Mr. WEBB. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad if the gentleman from Minnesota desires to use some time that he do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina occupied 25 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to 45 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that there is anything I need add to what has been said. I desire only to call attention in a general way to the character of the bill as it was originally introduced and as the committee modified it. The original bill was much more comprehensive in some respects, in fact it seemed to be broad enough to cover anything in the United States. The committee has modified it by limiting the scope of the bill to those things which are being used more directly by the Government in carrying on the war. The committee also broadened it, as the chairman has called attention to, as to the methods of committing the offenses, and having broadened it so as to comprehend a great many things that were not included in the original bill, it occurred to the committee that it would be necessary to again limit it so that it would not cover too much ground, so we inserted provisions in sections 2 and 3 limiting the same to acts of injury committed with intention to interfere with, obstruct, or delay the war, or to acts where the person committing the injury would have reason to believe that he was obstructing, delaying, or interfering with the war. As amended, I think this act will be so administered that it will only comprehend those things that we ought to reach. Those matters where slight injury is done, should not come under this act. The bill aims to protect docks, bridges, buildings, food, clothing, and almost everything that you can imagine. Now, a slight injury to any of those things would not, as a rule, be punished by this bill because it could not ordinarily be shown that the injury was done with the intention to interfere with the war, nor could it be said that the person would have reason to believe that such slight injury would so interfere. It seems to me that the substitute for the Senate bill submitted here safeguards the individual; he will not be in jeopardy unless he desires to be, and I think the bill is broad enough so that every case where the Government needs protection it can prosecute under this act and secure a conviction.

I think it is true that during this session and the preceding session the administration has been asking for powers that might be abused. I think the committee can justly claim that it has tried honestly to prevent giving the Government such powers I realize that in a time like this we ought to be careful. Public excitement runs high, and unless there is some protection in the law itself, some clear definition of every offense, men may be convicted and punished in cases where they ought not to be punished. I think, on the whole, the bill is fair and I hope will prove a salutary law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am having some difficulty in getting the real meaning of the committee in the phraseology contained in section 2, particularly as it may affect the right of action of individual workmen in their right to strike for the improvement of their condition.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am directing my inquiry to the gentleman from Minnesota. Take the wording of the first part of that paragraph, assuming the case of a railroad strike, where the railroad men had done nothing but impede the carriage of munitions of war, including grain that might deteriorate, on the roadway in case they are not hauled, they would undoubtedly under the first clause of section 2 be interfering with the United States in preparing for or carrying on the war. There is no question about that.

Mr. WEBB. If my friend will permit——

Mr. STAFFORD. The next question is whether they will by that act come under the subsequent penal provision as found in lines 13 and 14. Let me read it, having in mind the case of a striker on a railroad committing no overt act in injuring property, but only striking and impeding the carriage of grain or other foods that deteriorate because they are not carried to their destination, to the depots and the posts where they are needed for the support of our Army. Let us read it:

But when the United States is at war, whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war—

That goes down to line 15, where it goes on to say—shall willfully injure or destroy—

Of course, he is not willfully injuring anything—or shall attempt to so injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or war utilities——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just a minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. He is attempting to interfere with the war activities and his act of interfering with the transportation of foodstuffs is in effect injuring and destroying them.

Now, why is not the language broad enough to make it a crime under those circumstances for a man to strike and be punished under the phraseology of this section?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If you will pardon me, that question makes almost a speech.

Mr. STAFFORD. I knew the gentleman was not pressed for time, and I thought I would set forth fully my proposition. If I knew the gentleman had been pressed for time I would have condensed it in two words, perhaps.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Let me say that a criminal statute ordinarily is construed strictly. We have to-day upon the statute books a law authorizing strikes, permitting them. This bill could not be construed to repeal that statute.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That would remain in force.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit there?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just a minute. Now, the language is not only that a person must intend to obstruct the preparation for war, but he must also injure or destroy certain property.

Mr. STAFFORD. Or attempt——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Or attempt to injure or destroy certain things. I do not think that last part changes it at all. There must be an attempt to destroy or injure certain property.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, what is the natural consequence of a railroad strike, when in the organization of railroad men they determine to leave their employment and leave the freight cars on the tracks, which cars contain food and articles to supply our Army, except that the food and articles become deteriorated so that they can not reach their destination and be of value to the Government?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is not their act; that is their failure to act. This requires an act to injure or destroy.

Mr. STAFFORD. This would be construed under this phraseology as an attempt to injure and destroy war material, which would include food.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If it could be so construed, I would not hesitate a minute to make it the law, as the act would have to be done with intention to interfere with carrying on the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is not hesitating. But the question is how far are we going under this phraseology? What is the real extent of this phraseology when actually applied by our judicial officials?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Would the gentleman say that if the members of a railroad union struck and left food upon the tracks so that soldiers might starve, they ought not to be punished?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not say they should not; but I am only pointing out the fact that if your law goes to the extent as worded that they will not be enabled to strike for the improvement of their conditions under this law.

Mr. WALSH. They will not be enabled to strike and interfere with the United States in the conduct of this war, and that is what the language says. The gentleman is an expert in the English language and knows what it says.

Mr. STAFFORD. And, furthermore, another member of the committee, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], contended that if a railroad striker would in the strike injure the railroad property without intent to interfere with the war this phraseology would not extend to him. I am presenting a case, and I wish to call it to the attention of the House, that under the phraseology as drawn it would prevent, apparently, any strike whatever where the strikers were engaged in the manufacture or connected with the manufacture of munitions.

Mr. DYER. What is the gentleman's position upon that question that he is asking questions about?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am trying to ascertain from the committee whether they know fully the extent to which the phraseology of the law applies. There is a difference of opinion between members of the committee. I am pointing out a case where I say the law would apply, but the members of the committee say it would not.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is a very distinguished lawyer, and if he thinks it would apply, would he take it that it changed a law or a subject like this?

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill when it was last considered was punctured by the leader of the minority. It has been thrown upon us here without any time for consideration. The members of the committee differ as to the application of this law.

Mr. WALSH. There is no difference at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] differed in the construction of the law from the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. No; he did not.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I want to add a few words. I do not think there is any question about this language. It will have to be given a fair and reasonable interpretation, and it seems to me when you give it that it can not mean that a person is guilty because he may neglect to do certain things. He must be guilty of an act, not neglect. He must be charged with willfully injuring or destroying property with a certain intention or with a knowledge that it will result in injury to the Government. Now, the position that the gentleman assumes is that because laborers quit and neglect to do work, therefore they would be guilty. I do not think a criminal statute would ever be construed in any such fashion as that. It is an act that we condemn; it is not neglect. Of course, if men strike, and in that strike destroy or injure property, they would be guilty and ought to be punished. There is not any reason why the mantle of a labor organization should shield them from punishment any more than any other citizen of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I stated before, there is not a Member here on this floor that does not wish to punish that very character of act that the gentleman is referring to, but there are Members here who take a different construction of this bill from what the gentleman and other Members place upon it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GARLAND. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Very well.

Mr. GARLAND. What is the actual effect of the language here? Does it not stop the right of railroad men to strike when they are carrying war material?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so at all.

Mr. GARLAND. I want to be sure of that. I am not objecting to it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think it could ever have such an effect.

Mr. GARLAND. There is a difference of opinion in the committee as to the effect. Let us know.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We can only give you an opinion. Here is the language. It does provide for an affirmative, a specific act, a willful act. It can only be construed to interfering with labor organizations or strikes if it can be held to condemn omissions to do things. For instance, it is suggested that if you delay food in a train, that food will deteriorate and thus be lost to the soldiers.

Mr. GARLAND. Then it does mean that?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It does not condemn anything of that kind. I am positive it could not be construed as meaning anything like that. It would not repeal the statute giving a right to strike. Repeals by implication are not favored.

Mr. GARLAND. It stops men from striking when carrying war materials?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS. Under this section the gist of the offense would be the destruction of war material, willfully injuring or destroying war material. That would have to be proved in the event the Government sought a conviction, and the Government would have to go further than that and prove that the destruction was with the intent and purpose to injure the United States or some nation engaged with it in this war. Two things: First, the willful destruction or attempt to destroy war materials; second, that that attempt was made with the deliberate purpose to injure this Government or one of its allies engaged in this war. That is all that is in the section, and that is in the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to use some time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a difference of opinion among the members of the committee as to just what this proposed substitute means. It has been a long time since I practiced law on a country circuit, 40 years plus, so that I do not know that my opinion as to what this bill means is of much account to myself or much account to the House.

But I will tell you what I would like to see done. I would like to see carried out President Wilson's recommendations when he addressed Congress on the Adamson bill, for which I voted, for that part that was then vital, with the crops ready to move, when I believed there would be a tie-up of the great terminals that would be disastrous. I doubt if I would have voted for it if it had not been for all of the recommendations in his address, which I had the right to believe would be enacted into law when the Congress met in December.

Now, I have never gotten along very well with Samuel Gompers. I agree with him in some things and I disagree with him in others. But it seems to me as a war measure he and every other patriotic citizen ought to agree upon this proposition—I will not say as peace legislation, because I know that he would not agree with me, touching peace legislation—but for war legislation I believe this or some other similar bill ought to be enacted that would render it unlawful, pending disagreement during the war, to interfere with production or transportation in American bottoms on the sea or on the railroads in the United States, on the farm, in a munition factory; that whoever conspired—mind you, now, not whoever refused to work as individuals, but whoever conspired—to obstruct the Government in the conduct of the war should be guilty of a crime.

Why, think of it! We draft the men and send them into the trenches, our citizens. They have got to have food, they have got to have munitions, with all that that means. They have got to have clothing, and they depend upon the people, their fellow citizens, to give them all that is necessary, and they do that without regard to the hours of labor. My God, if there should be a proposition that they should not fight for more than eight hours, they would be absolutely of no account in the event they were attacked or in the event they were attacking the enemy.

Now, whoever conspires to strike in an iron mine, or in a coal mine, or in a copper mine, or in a zinc mine, or in a factory; or whoever strikes where there is production of food; whoever strikes where it is necessary to have transportation, and does it by virtue of a conspiracy, he ought to be guilty of a crime.

As I had occasion to say formerly, a chain is no stronger than its weakest link. Now, then, if this legislation is broad enough to cover the people, over 100,000,000 of them, that have organized an army and sent it into the trenches and that have constructed railroads and set them in operation and have constructed ships and put them upon the sea—if it is broad enough to cover all the balance of us in giving them proper protection and proper support to enable them to be efficient in war, why, then, I am for the bill, and whoever is not in favor of just what I have spoken all along the line, to cover every one of 100,000,000 people during the continuance of this war, in my opinion is not a good citizen, and, if necessary, I would vote for legislation to punish him if he or they violate the law. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, this is essentially a matter of war legislation. In answer to the inquiries of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, and Illinois, I beg leave for a few moments to call attention to certain existing laws and what this law seeks to put in their place.

Section 1668 of the present Revised Statutes provides a penalty for anyone who procures or entices any artificer or workman retained or employed in any arsenal or armory from leaving his work or to avoid or to break any contract he has for the performance of labor with and for the United States. Section 1669, the following section, provides a penalty for any workman who willfully and obstinately refuses to perform work assigned to him or who willfully and obstinately breaks a tool or any material used by him in the manufacture of Government work. These are the laws which have been enacted in times of peace. The committee substitute deals with the assemblage of the powers of the United States in three branches: First, war material; second, war buildings; and, third, war utilities; and it assembles these things, whether they be owned by the United States or by a private individual. Any building wherever war material is being made, even though privately owned, is under this committee substitute "war premises." It is, as I say, essentially a matter of war legislation, for it is an assemblage under the control and protection of the Government of things which are thought necessary for the continuance and perpetuity of the national life. Therefore, to the centralized power of the Government of all of the States—not in time of peace, but in time of war—is intrusted the protection of war materials, of war premises, and of war utilities. There is no doubt but that this bill covers a willful attack with intent to injure the United States in the destruction of material in any privately owned building.

There is equally no doubt under this bill that it applies not alone to the United States but to the associate nations, and by "associate nations" we say in this committee substitute any nation at war with any nation with which the United States is at war. So that this bill seeks to protect with all of the power of the United States the things which are necessary for the winning of this war by the United States and its associate nations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I did not get the citation of the gentleman at the beginning of his remarks.

Mr. GARD. I referred to two sections, one section 1668 and the other section 1669 of the Revised Statutes. These are statutes essential in time of peace.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Those are Federal statutes?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I understood the gentleman to say Ohio.

Mr. GARD. No; they are Federal statutes. They are essentially peace statutes, and this is equally as essentially a war measure. I do not think there can be any reason by which you can read anything into this law other than the very vital and controlling principles which appear on line 13 of page 3, for the crime which is carried all through this bill is willfully injuring or destroying or attempting to so injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or war utility.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. COX. I am very much in sympathy with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said a moment ago, and I want the gentleman's opinion on section 2 of the bill, as to whether it would be broad enough to cover the cases suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, where men conspire to strike and to quit, and things like that, which would bring production to a standstill. Of course, that is destroying the power of the Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has control of the time.

Mr. WEBB. I can yield the gentleman one more minute for the question, but I have promised all of the time allotted to me. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield me five minutes?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Then I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COX. Is the language in section 2 or 3 of this bill broad enough to cover cases of that kind?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I am frank to say to the gentleman from Indiana, and likewise in answer to the suggestion or inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], that I do not think the language of section 2 would apply to a condition of conspiracy, or to any attempt by inaction, by not doing something to create the condition of which the gentleman speaks, and of which the gentleman from Illinois has spoken. The language of the bill in section 2, and it follows its meaning all through the bill, is that whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall do what? "Shall willfully injure or destroy or shall attempt to so injure or destroy." That is the crime—that he shall willfully injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or war utilities. I think the only construction which can be given to this law as it is presented by this committee substitute is that something must have been actively done by which one willfully and with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States does something to injure or destroy or attempts to injure or destroy. I do not believe that the mere fact that one leaves a work, though essential to the Government, however wrong it may be from a moral standpoint, however it may be lacking in patriotism, would come within this law. In other words, I want to insist that my opinion of this statutory language as at present suggested is that it means some willful act must have been done or attempted to be done which would destroy or injure war materials, war premises, or war utilities.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman think it ought to be broad enough to cover that case?

Mr. GARD. I think it the primary duty of the people to-day, whether it is labor in the field or the shop or the shipyard, to labor for one thing, and that one thing is the winning of this war. I do not believe it should be obstructed or interfered with either by open act or by conspiracy. But so far as this act is concerned, it establishes a regulation of two things: First, the destruction of property; and, second, it goes beyond section 1669 of the Revised Statutes and creates a new act that when the United States is at war, one who willfully makes or causes to be made in a defective manner any war material—for instance, who willfully makes an engine for a submarine with a faulty cylinder, or one who willfully makes a defective gun barrel, or one who willfully puts weak material into the planes for an aeroplane—any man who does it willfully with the intent to interfere with and obstruct the United States in its conduct of the war, is held to be guilty of a crime. It is a crime essentially of war time and made necessary because of war conditions.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says this is a war measure?

Mr. GARD. It is; it has no application except in time of war.

Mr. CANNON. What would the gentleman say to this amendment: In line 8, section 2, after the word "injure," insert the words "by conspiracy or otherwise to"? It seems to me that would cover the whole shooting match.

Mr. GARD. The objection I would have to that—and my objection is a legal one—my objection is that that should be added to the present conspiracy statutes which the United States already has.

Mr. CANNON. But we are not liable to get that. It would be legal to insert those words and have it enacted into law during the war, and it would prevent conspiracy to destroy production.

Mr. GARD. I see nothing against the legality.

Mr. WEBB. Let me say that it is a crime now under the general law of the United States to conspire to violate any United States statute. When this bill passes it will be a crime to conspire to violate any act prohibited by it.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know about that, but I will test the sense of the House and offer the amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], a member of the committee.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I did not at first desire to discuss the bill. I want to do so now to answer the suggestion of some gentlemen on the Republican side of the Chamber that this is an act that could be construed to prohibit strikes. If gentlemen will bear with me one minute, I wish to point out its real intent. There are three sections in the proposed act. The first deals wholly with definitions, undertaking to define what it is that the act declares shall be a crime if they be destroyed with intent to injure the United States in times of war. Section 2 and section 3 are the penal provisions of the act. They give to the Federal courts in time of war power to punish willful and malicious acts. That is all. Under a penal statute "willful" means an act done with wrongful intent or a bad motive. Therefore, a conspiracy is not touched in this act at all, nor is the right to strike interfered with. The proposed act provides "that if anyone shall willfully, with intent to injure property or interfere with the conduct of the war, destroy or attempt to destroy property." That is the only offense. It does not say that a man shall work or he can not work. Intent or knowledge is the essence of the act. If he accidentally or unintentionally injures property he is not guilty of an offense. But if he willfully, with a wrongful intent, does something that in its nature is calculated to interfere with the waging of the war by destroying property of the United States or property that has already been designed or intended for or set aside for the use of the United States in waging the war, he is guilty. That is all.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think it ought to be extended so as to include ships?

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely no. This bill is not intended to affect workingmen in their relation to the Government. Whether Congress should undertake to conscript labor is a question which we are not now considering. Some people think we should. That is the only way you could keep anybody from striking, because the Constitution says you can not make a man work if he wants to quit unless as a punishment for crime. Congress has not the power to say you shall not strike.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am anxious to get the gentleman's opinion on this: Congress could not, and I do not think it ever should, tell a man that he can not quit work if he wants to, but Congress could properly say that a man should be guilty if he tries to organize his fellow workers for the purpose of bringing on a general cessation of work?

Mr. CARAWAY. That could be done.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. Suppose, for illustration, there is a strike, and incidental to the strike trouble that is going on war materials are destroyed. Would this bill reach that case?

Mr. CARAWAY. Incidental may mean anything. If a man incidentally destroys property in his pursuit of a lawful end in a lawful manner as an incident of the strike, he is not guilty, but if in asserting his right to strike he should willfully and intentionally destroy property that was necessary for the Government to carry on this work he would fall within the provisions of this bill, and be punished under it.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. Does not the bill go a little bit further than that? One of the provisions does not require intent on the part of the acting party to injure the United States, but if he destroys or attempts to destroy property that he has reasonable cause to believe would injure the United States——

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course.

Mr. REAVIS. No matter what his intent was, his intent might be to injure the railroad company or to get even with some enemy, but acting under that intent if he has reasonable cause to believe that the consequences of his act are an injury to the United States he comes under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is that so?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is in the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not find the language, and I would like to have it pointed out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes additional.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I certainly hope the gentleman will have it, because I used a part of his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the time is regulated automatically by the rules of the House.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, maybe I can straighten out the matter. I ask how much time the gentleman from Minnesota has.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Eighteen minutes, I think.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Could I have some of that time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota has 18 minutes left and the gentleman from North Carolina 10 minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas, as I have 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Colorado makes a point of order that there is no quorum present. Does the gentleman insist upon his point of order?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; I think the matter is of such importance that the Members of the House should hear the discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three hundred and twenty-two Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], who had not completed his statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I want merely to supplement what I said rather imperfectly. I undertook to say that this bill did not deal with labor nor labor disturbances at all. It undertook to make a penal offense where anyone willfully destroyed or undertook to destroy certain properties, if he had the intent to destroy the property to injure the Government or had reasonable information to believe that his act would interfere with the prosecution of the war. Broadly speaking, it merely gives to the Federal courts the power to punish malicious mischief; that is all. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] undertook to inject in it a minute ago the suggestion for an amendment which would punish conspirators and strikers. Now, the general law has a provision that punishes people who conspire to commit an act that is made a crime by statute, so therefore the only effect, if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois should be adopted and made a part of this bill, under the language as it is now drafted, would be to prevent people from conspiring to strike because there is a law on the statute books now that would punish them for conspiring to do an unlawful act, and it will be an unlawful act if this becomes a law if they undertake to destroy or try to destroy certain properties designated in this bill. Therefore I am inclined to believe that anyone who stops to consider will see that the suggested amendment has no standing in this particular bill.

We are not dealing with labor troubles. We are undertaking, as I said, to extend the jurisdiction of the Federal court to punish malicious mischief. In section 2, which is the first penal section, we say:

That when the United States is at war, whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, or whoever, with reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall willfully injure or destroy, or shall attempt to so injure or destroy, any war material, war premises, or war utilities as herein defined.

Now, that is the penal part of section 2, namely, where he destroys or attempts to destroy, with the intent to injure or with knowledge that the destruction may injure the United States in preparing for or carrying on the war, the things that are defined in section 1 as war utensils or war materials, and nothing else.

Section 3 makes it a crime where a workingman, dealing with war materials or with war utensils as herein defined, shall make, willfully and intentionally, these things defectively. The intent to do wrong, the intent to injure, or with the knowledge that it may injure, must always be present if there is any crime.

Now, I hope after reading it that any gentleman will see we are not dealing with the labor situation at all; not undertaking to say that men shall or shall not strike. We are not preparing a statute dealing with conspiracies, but with acts themselves; and therefore the suggested amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is wholly out of place in this act, and I do not think anyone who has read the bill with care and who is in sympathy with the legislation can afford to inject that question in this bill now. If Congress should deal—and I am not saying it should—with labor conditions, it ought to be in a bill prepared for that specific purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would this section 3 of this bill be likely to deal with sabotage as practiced by men who are destroying material or articles, and would it deal probably with the slowing up of labor in munition plants?

Mr. CARAWAY. It would not. It must be a willful act to injure or hinder the Government in waging war. We have laws now on the books to meet the other situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That might be sabotage.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is the workman himself who makes in a defective manner the tool he is manufacturing for the Government we here deal with, where the defect is with a willful intent to injure the Government.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this is a very drastic bill and one that ought to command the attention of the Members because of that fact and because of its importance. We all realize and understand that were we not at war such a bill would not be considered by Congress at all. These provisions that this bill affects, and for which it would punish, are all now taken care of by States. There are laws in every State that prohibit in effect everything that is covered by this bill. Congress with its war powers feels that it is important that this legislation should be considered and enacted. I believe, gentlemen, that it should be, and that there should not be any amendment made to this bill such as has been suggested by several gentlemen.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], by an inquiry, endeavored to lead to the belief that this bill would affect labor organizations, and that it would prevent strikes and combinations of men along that line. This bill, if enacted into law, would cover anyone who violated its provisions. If a laboring man in a factory where munitions were made and assembled, and so forth, should do anything with reference to destroying or making ineffective the machinery of the war, he would be amenable to it. But to say that the mere striking or his refusal to work would be punishable by this bill if enacted into law is, in my opinion, not so. There has been some discussion in this country as to the possible necessity of enacting a law to prevent strikes without first submitting the matter to arbitration. That law, if enacted by this Congress, should, as has been suggested by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], be considered by a committee with due deliberation and consideration. Other countries that are engaged in this war have enacted legislation somewhat similar to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished ex-Speaker [Mr. CANNON], and others. The munitions-of-war act of Great Britain provides that it is unlawful for anyone to take part in a lockout or in a strike in connection with any difference, and where war munitions are being made, and so forth, unless the differences have first been reported to the board of trade and 21 days have elapsed since the date of the report and the difference has not during that time been referred by the board of trade for settlement in accordance with the act. That is the law in Great Britain. That would be the proper way to take up this question regarding labor.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. For information only. As I understand it, the proposed bill is a war bill, pure and simple. Now, there is a statute in force against conspiracy——

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is there any statute in force now in this country making it unlawful for men to strike?

Mr. DYER. There is none that I know of.

Mr. COX. I understood some one in the course of this discussion to say there was a statute in force making it a criminal offense to strike; and if this bill should become a law, would that law that is now on the statute books be affected?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield me one minute more?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. REAVIS. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], the suggestion, as I remember it, was this, that there is a statute making conspiracy to destroy property a crime.

Mr. DYER. But not to strike.

Mr. REAVIS. Or a conspiracy to violate law a crime. If this bill is enacted into law, then a conspiracy to do the acts prohibited by this act would come under it.

Mr. COX. Is that a dead letter until this becomes a law?

Mr. REAVIS. It is not, for this reason, namely, that this is not the only offense prescribed by statute.

Mr. COX. Would this be an enabling act to the law now in force?

Mr. REAVIS. There is a statute making conspiracy to destroy property an offense.

Mr. DYER. But not to strike.

Mr. REAVIS. Not to strike.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But is there not always a misunderstanding where that law acts, as compared with where the State laws act, with regard to conspiracy to destroy property?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the munitions-of-war act, 1915, of Great Britain, to which I have referred, are as follows:

2. (1) An employer shall not declare, cause, or take part in a lockout, and a person employed shall not take part in a strike, in connection with any difference to which this part of this act applies, unless the difference has been reported to the board of trade and 21 days have elapsed since the date of the report, and the difference has not during that time been referred by the board of trade for settlement in accordance with this act.

(2) If any person acts in contravention of this section, he shall be guilty of an offense under this act.

14. (1) Any person guilty of an offense under this act—

* * * * * * *

(b) Shall, if the offense is a contravention of the provisions of this act with respect to the prevention of lockouts, be liable to a fine not exceeding £5, in respect of each man locked out, for each day or part of a day during which the contravention continues; and

(c) Shall, if the offense is a contravention of the provisions of this act with respect to the prohibition of strikes, be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for each day or part of a day during which the contravention continues; and

* * * * * * *

19. In this act, unless the context otherwise requires—

(a) The expression "lockout" means the closing of a place of employment, or the suspension of work, or the refusal by an employer to continue to employ any number of persons employed by him in consequence of a dispute, done with a view to compelling those persons, or to aid another employer in compelling persons employed by him, to accept terms or conditions of or affecting employment.

(b) The expression "strike" means the cessation of work by a body of persons employed acting in combination, or a concerted refusal, or a refusal under a common understanding of any number of persons employed to continue to work for an employer in consequence of a dispute, done as a means of compelling their employer or any person or body of persons employed, or to aid other workmen in compelling their employer or any person or body of persons employed, to accept or not to accept terms or conditions of or affecting employment.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, then, if this bill is enacted into law, making the acts prohibited an offense, and people conspire to commit those acts but do not commit them, they are amenable to the conspiracy law, but not under this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, there is a law now on the statute books making a criminal offense of many of the things forbidden or prohibited in the measure we are now considering, and it occurs to me that there may be confusion if this bill also should become a law. The food-control act, as it is known, approved August 10 last, makes it unlawful to destroy any necessaries, and "necessaries" in that act are described as food, feed, fuel, including fuel oil, gas, and implements and machinery required in the production of any of these things. Those are all war materials as they are described by other words in this bill, and punishment is provided for the violation of that act. A fine not exceeding $5,000 may be imposed, or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. There might be a conflict between that law and this one.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Such destruction is only for the purpose of enhancing prices.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Not that alone. The law provides punishment for destroying "necessaries" in order to reduce the supply or enhance the price.

Now, as to the offense described in this bill, in my judgment the offense is better described in the food-control bill. This bill makes it an offense if one destroys property that he knows is "intended to be used by the United States" in its different activities in carrying on the war. Also, it is made an offense, and must be established in the trial, that one has "reason to believe" that these articles—naming them—are to be used by the Government or are useful in certain respects connected with the war.

We studied a long time, Mr. Speaker, when we were framing the food-control act to find the best words to be used in setting forth the offense connected with the waste and destruction of food and other "necessaries," and it seemed to us that the words that would best fit the situation were the words used in this statute, "in order to reduce the supply or enhance the price."

Now, the idea that we are trying to reach in this bill is to prevent the destruction of goods of one kind and another, so that the supply may not be decreased, and it seems to me that it would be easier to establish the guilt and to secure conviction if one charged with the offense of destroying property with intent to reduce the supply thereof than if he were charged and proof must be made in accordance with this bill as it is now worded. It will be difficult to establish the fact that the man charged with the crime knew that these goods were "intended for the use" of the United States or that he "had reason to believe" that they were necessary for use by the Government in carrying on the war, and so forth.

I simply call the attention of the House to the fact that there is already on the books a law, broad in its provisions, treating with much of the same matter that is treated in this bill, and that there may be confusion, and that, in my judgment, the words used in the food-control bill, some of them, are better than are the words used in the pending measure. I suggest these matters to the careful consideration of those who have this bill in charge.

I wish to call attention to another section of the food-control act—section 9 of that act. It forbids and provides punishment for conspiracies practically as follows:

That any person who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any "necessaries"; to restrict the supply of any necessaries; to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of necessaries, and so forth, shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, and so forth.

Here is an act for the punishment of conspiracies in relation to many of the things with which the bill we are now considering deals. This portion of the bill is not necessary, and the rest of it, whatever may be necessary or proper, ought to be in better form. Many of the things described in this bill are the identical things described as "necessaries" in the food act, and it is certainly not necessary or proper to enact another law for the punishment, as this bill seeks to do, of those who would combine or conspire to destroy or prevent or interfere with the production of all these things.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has seven minutes remaining, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has five.

Mr. WEBB. Through an arrangement with Mr. WALSH, he kindly yield to me five minutes given to him by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes remaining, counting that. Some gentleman who was on the floor, I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], was permitted to go on for five minutes after the gentleman had yielded five minutes. It was deducted from the time of the gentleman from Minnesota and credited to the time of the gentleman from North Carolina. The gentleman from Minnesota has now seven minutes left, and the gentleman from North Carolina has five.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE], a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the substitute offered by the committee. There seems to be some confusion, however, in regard to the purposes of the bill. It was introduced in April a year ago at the suggestion of the Department of Justice, and passed the Senate and was reported to the House. After some discussion in the House the bill was thought to be too drastic and was again taken up by the committee, and a substitute has been reported after the Attorney General had urged the necessity of some additional legislation.

As the bill came from the Senate a year ago, almost, it provided only for the punishment of offenses as the result of the use of explosives or by fire or by violent means. As the bill is now reported, it relates to any injury willfully inflicted. The bill, as I understand it—and I am sure that that is the purpose of the bill—is to make a Federal offense of what is now a State offense in the States for willful and malicious destruction of property.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. What law of any State does the gentleman recall at this time that would include the offenses enumerated in section 3 of the bill as to making defective ammunition and the like? Where is there any State law providing against that?

Mr. IGOE. I speak of section 2. I do not know of any State law that relates to the provisions of section 3.

Mr. KEARNS. I am not objecting. I think the law ought to pass.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the Members of the House will not inject into this bill the labor question. It has no place in this bill. It was not considered by the committee. There is no question in this country or any of the nations that are at war more far-reaching and important than that very question, and it is not proper and it is not statesmanlike to propose a bill or an amendment, in a few minutes without proper consideration, affecting that very important and far-reaching question.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I do.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman any bill before his committee that would deal with this labor problem?

Mr. IGOE. No. The gentleman's committee, so far as I know, has not suggested a bill. But I do know this, that the President of the United States and the Cabinet have been dealing with that question and considering it almost from the day this war began.

Mr. COX. I know; but they deal with it one day and apparently settle it to-day, and it breaks out again to-morrow worse than ever. Can we not get some law that would take hold of that bunch of men?

Mr. IGOE. The trouble is that the gentleman is trying to settle in two minutes on this floor by devising an amendment a question that the President and all the nations at war have not been able to settle thus far.

Mr. COX. Something ought to be done.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman is trying to make an amendment to prevent men from going on a strike. If his amendment were adopted, it would be an offense to say that the farmers shall not plant wheat because they can get more for corn.

Mr. COX. Ought it not to be?

Mr. IGOE. That would be diminishing the supply. I am not prepared to say what we will be called upon to do, but I do say that whatever we do ought to be done only after mature and careful consideration and consultation with the people affected by the legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I do.

Mr. CANNON. Would the gentleman think it wise to provide that the boys in the Army might conspire?

Mr. IGOE. That has been provided against by the rules of war which have been in force for hundreds of years, and everybody knows that.

Mr. COX. If the boys in the Army conspired they would be court-martialed and shot.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not more important, or equally important, that the boys shall be clothed and fed and armed? [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. I agree with that, and we are all for doing that, but I venture to say that if you undertake to put a brand upon every laboring man and every farmer in the United States, without giving him a chance to be heard, without consulting with him, you are going to run up against a condition that in the end will be worse than the condition that the gentleman sees now.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. IGOE. I do.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. There is a law on the books now, passed last August, against conspiracies, combinations, and agreements or arrangements, and that law includes farming—a law against the destruction of foodstuffs or any of the necessaries of life.

Mr. IGOE. Can not an individual farmer now say, "I am not satisfied with the price of wheat and I will grow corn," and if he chooses to do so can you now prevent it?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. An individual farmer can not make a conspiracy, but two farmers together can make a conspiracy.

Mr. IGOE. These gentlemen are not trying to reach conspiracies. They would reach the individual, because, under the bill it is provided that no individual may do certain things. There is a law now, as the gentleman knows, against conspiracy, under which if men combine to do things which are denounced in this act they may be punished as for a conspiracy. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I hope very much that the House will not adopt this amendment offered by my distinguished friend from Illinois, if he means to include strikes. It is certainly too short a time in which to handle such a stupendous and important question. Whatever our personal feeling may be about the man who strikes, it is a very dangerous thing to legislate upon that with as little consideration as we are able to give it here. Besides that, the amendment that the gentleman offers does not cover the ground which he wants to cover. He wants to insert after the word "injury," in line 8, page 3, the words "by conspiracy or otherwise." That would mean that if anybody through a conspiracy injures or destroys Government property he will be guilty of a crime under the act. That adds nothing at all to the bill and is absolutely useless and unnecessary.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I understood I had five minutes from the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. It was all used up by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have two minutes, and I yield those two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the time may be extended five minutes, to go to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes, to go to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Let me finish this statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CANNON. Now, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WEBB. When I finish this statement.

Mr. CANNON. I wanted to give the gentleman the amendment that I propose to offer.

Mr. WEBB. Let me finish my statement about the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I have not offered any amendment yet.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman, of course.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will take the House substitute and turn to page 3, line 15, I propose, after the word "defined" to insert:

or shall conspire to prevent the erection or production of such war premises, war material, or war utilities.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that amendment is germane. We are dealing above, in that same section, with persons who with intent to delay the progress of the war injure or destroy something. I do not think the amendment is germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that when he gets to it.

Mr. WEBB. Now, the gentleman offers an amendment making it an additional crime to conspire—not to prevent an overt act but just simply to conspire to do something without denouncing the act. It does not require that a man shall do something, but just a mere conspiracy behind closed doors would make it a crime under this statute.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to my friend from Nebraska; yes.

Mr. REAVIS. It is existing law now that a conspiracy to offend against the law of the United States is an offense. If this bill is enacted and becomes a law, will not a conspiracy to perform the act prohibited by this bill be punishable under the conspiracy act?

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend, as I said a while ago, that section 37 of the criminal code provides that if two or more persons conspire to commit any offense against the United States, and so forth, he is guilty of a crime. So if this bill is passed as we recommend in the substitute, then a conspiracy to commit any of the offenses denounced in the bill will be a crime. I know what my friend wants, but it is rather difficult to accomplish unless you simply pass a bill absolutely forbidding laboring men to strike; but that is too big and broad a question at present to handle in this summary way. I am afraid the adoption of the gentleman's amendment would probably delay the passage of the bill, which we do think is so important at this time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. I understood a moment ago that the gentleman from Minnesota had agreed to yield to me the remainder of his time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is it—two minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I do not care for that, Mr. Speaker, and I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there any amendment pending?

Mr. WEBB. The committee substitute for the House bill, and no other.

Mr. COX. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Will amendments be offered to the committee substitute or to the Senate bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I suggest that the committee substitute for the Senate bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to punish the willful injury or destruction of war material or of war premises or utilities used in connection with war material, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the words "war material," as used herein, shall include arms, armament, ammunition, clothing, food, supplies, stores, and all other articles of whatever description intended to be used by the United States, or any associate nation, in connection with the conduct of the war.

The words "war premises," as used herein, shall include all buildings, grounds, mines, or other places wherein such war material is being produced, manufactured, repaired, stored, mined, extracted, distributed, loaded, unloaded, or transported, together with all machinery and appliances therein contained; and all forts, arsenals, navy yards, camps, prisons, or other military or naval stations of the United States or any associate nation.

The words "war utilities," as used herein, shall include all railroads, railways, electric lines, roads of whatever description, railroad or railway fixture, canal, lock, dam, wharf, pier, dock, bridge, building, structure, engine, machine, mechanical contrivance, car, vehicle, boat, or aircraft, or any other means of transportation whatsoever, whereon or whereby such war material or any troops of the United States, or of any associate nation, are being or about to be transported, either within the limits of the United States or upon the high seas; and all dams, reservoirs, aqueducts, water and gas mains and pipes, structures, and buildings whereby or in connection with which water or gas is being furnished to the military or naval forces of the United States or any associate nation, and all electric light and power, steam or pneumatic power, telephone and telegraph plants, poles, wires, and fixtures, and wireless stations, and the buildings connected with the maintenance and operation thereof used to supply water, light, heat, power, or facilities of communication to the military or naval forces of the United States or any associate nation.

The words "United States" shall include the Canal Zone and all territory and waters, continental and insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

The words "associate nation," as used in this act, shall be deemed to mean any nation at war with any nation with which the United States is at war.

SEC. 2. That when the United States is at war, whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, or whoever, with reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall willfully injure or destroy, or shall attempt to so injure or destroy, any war material, war premises, or war utilities, as herein defined, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 30 years, or both.

SEC. 3. That when the United States is at war, whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, or whoever, with reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall willfully make or cause to be made in a defective manner, or attempt to make or cause to be made in a defective manner, any war material, as herein defined, or any tool, implement, machine, utensil, or receptacle used or employed in making, producing, manufacturing, or repairing any such war material, as herein defined, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 30 years, or both.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, before moving the previous question I desire to yield ample time to gentlemen who have amendments to offer to discuss them.

Mr. COX. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I would like to get an agreement. I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The SPEAKER. The trouble is that the gentleman has no time to yield.

Mr. WEBB. I can move the previous question, but I do not want to do so until gentlemen discuss their amendments.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from North Carolina any proposition to make?

Mr. WEBB. I ask unanimous consent that each amendment offered shall be debated five minutes, and after that time the previous question on the substitute and bill shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman mean five minutes, pro and con?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman had better postpone that temporarily; it may be that we will want a little more time.

Mr. WEBB. I would have no objection to that if I could get an understanding as to time. I want to state that once I got caught in this condition. I had a bill to which there was no objection, and a Member got the floor and talked an hour.

The SPEAKER. Any Member who gets the floor under the general rules of the House has a right to take an hour if he wants it. If the gentleman asks to proceed under the five-minute rule as it is conducted in Committee of the Whole, the Chair will put that request.

Mr. WEBB. I think that is fair. I ask unanimous consent that on each amendment there may be five minutes for the proponents and five minutes in opposition.

Mr. CANNON. There may be amendments to an amendment. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the committee will be liberal in this matter.

Mr. WEBB. I will say that I will. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to consider amendments to this bill under the five-minute rule as used in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, does that include pro forma amendments?

Mr. WEBB. It includes anything germane or appropriate under the five-minute rule of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, after the word "defined," insert "or shall conspire to prevent the erection or production of such war premises, war materials, or war utilities."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I hoped that the gentleman from North Carolina would accept the amendment. Does it add anything to the law? Some gentlemen have said that it does not add anything to it. If so, it can do no hurt.

Mr. WEBB. I make the statement, if the gentleman will permit, that his amendment punishes conspiracy without any overt act. The gentleman has not made the matter he speaks of in his amendment—that is, the prevention of the erection or production, and so forth—a crime. He undertakes to punish a man who conspires, simply, without punishing the completed act.

Mr. CANNON. Let me read it as it would read if the amendment was adopted.

Section 2 would read as follows:

SEC. 2. That when the United States is at war, whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, or whoever, with reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall willfully injure or destroy, or shall attempt to so injure or destroy, any war material, war premises, or war utilities, as herein defined, or shall conspire to prevent the erection or production of such war premises, war materials, or war utilities, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 30 years, or both.

Now, I fancy that it would amount to something if the amendment went in there. I believe it ought to go in. What is the use of shying? I ask it in all good faith. This is a war measure and not a peace measure. If the Industrial Workers of the World or any other set of people—if the farmers, if the producers, or anybody that produces anything that is necessary to carry on this war—conspires, in the language of this section and of this substitute, then they are guilty of a crime.

You may say that it is crude, that it has no place here. Well, for everything a place, for all times a season. The fact that the war is on, and especially this war, makes this amendment apt. Does any Member who listens to me want to say that we have sent these soldiers abroad and yet that men can conspire to keep them from getting food, to prevent the construction of ships to carry the food, or of convoys to transport them when they cross, and all along the line—that the coal that is necessary, the iron that is necessary, the munitions that are necessary shall not go? If so, I am not in harmony with him, and I am here to say if anybody wants to criticize me for holding these opinions, by political threat or otherwise, and no one on the floor of the House desires to make a political threat, I would rather take the criticism and die than not to attempt to put the law on the statute books. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I say again that I do not think that this is the way to reach this tremendous subject.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 291 Members, a quorum, answered to their names.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CALDWELL, for one week, on account of important business;

To Mr. JONES of Texas, for one week, on account of illness;

To Mr. BRAND, for the day, on account of sickness;

To Mr. COOPER of Ohio, for a few days, on account of sickness in family; and

To Mr. KEHOE, until 4 o'clock p. m. to-day, on account of official business.

INJURY TO WAR MATERIAL.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] introduces a brand-new offense into the bill. We propose in the bill to punish any person who intends to interfere with the war, and with that intent destroys or injures some war utility or premise. The gentleman from Illinois provides a brand-new offense and says whoever shall conspire to prevent the erection or production of such war premises, and so forth, shall be punished. We have said nothing about the production or erection of war premises in the definition of war utilities, war premises, and so forth, so his amendment is entirely new. If the House desires to put a new offense into the bill, of course it can do so, and I have no objection; but in doing so it seems to me it would desire to require the same of the man who commits this offense as we do of the man who commits the other offenses set out in the bill. We propose that the man should intend to injure or delay the prosecution of the war, or that he had reasonable ground to know that his act would do that. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if the House desires to add this new offense, it ought to add the words "Whoever with intent to interfere with or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for and carrying on the war shall conspire to prevent the erection or production," and so forth, so as to make it harmonize with the preceding definitions of offenses. Otherwise you have two plans of finding men guilty. With one class, where a man blows up some war utility you have to prove that he had intent to injure or interfere with the prosecution of the war; but with another class, where two men sit down and talk about their refusal to build a telegraph line or an aqueduct or a sewer, while they may not be guilty of any overt act at all, if you prove they simply conspired together, without any intent to injure the war at all, you make them guilty of crime.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Therefore, unless the gentleman's amendment is amended to correspond to the rest of the bill, I do not think the house ought to adopt it, in view of the requirements as to the other offenses in the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is amended by the insertion of the words "with such intent," would the gentleman from North Carolina object to it then?

Mr. WEBB. You could not use the words "with such intent."

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Why not?

Mr. WEBB. You can meet it by adding the language I have just read.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Why would not the words "with such intent" cover the proposition?

Mr. WEBB. If you put after the word "defined"——

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Personally, I do not agree with the gentleman's construction. I think the language of the gentleman from Illinois now includes all that goes before it, but certainly it would if you said, "with such intent." Would the gentleman object to it then?

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection, but if you put in the language "whoever, with intent to injure, interferes with, or obstructs the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall conspire to prevent the erection or production of such war premises or war materials or war utilities," then, you have something in keeping with the rest of the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Has the gentleman any objection?

Mr. WEBB. I do not see any objection, but I do not see much use of it, because we have a general conspiracy statute now.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will permit, if I understood the gentleman aright, he wants to do just what I want to do. Now, I will tell you the people I want to catch. Take the I. W. W.——

Mr. WEBB. I want to catch those, too; of course we all do; in fact, everybody who is trying to delay or obstruct the prosecution of the war.

Mr. CANNON. Take a thousand of them in the shipyards or in the forests and they go to work and conspire and arm. They do not commit any act. Have we got to wait until they kill and destroy and burn or commit any of these acts? I have no objection, if I understand the modification, to the amendment as amended, but I think it means that now.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. KEATING. When the gentleman introduced this bill was it his intention, or was it the intention of his committee, to prevent a man from striking?

Mr. WEBB. I will answer that question in the negative; it was not. We have eminent and patriotic men, representing the Government at the request of the President, looking after all strikes or threatened strikes.

Mr. KEATING. Is not the object of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to prevent strikes? Is not that the real object of the proposition?

Mr. WEBB. His language does not do so.

Mr. KEATING. Is not that what he seeks to accomplish?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know what is in his mind, but I know what his language is. He now proposes to say, if he adopts my suggestion that whoever shall conspire to prevent the erection or production of such war premises or war materials or utilities with intent to hinder, delay, or to injure the prosecution of the war shall be guilty of an offense. That would not apply to strikers any more than anybody else.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time be extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the gentleman from Colorado a question in the time of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts to interrogate the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. WEBB. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Colorado believe, if it is going to interfere with our winning the war, that people ought to have the right to strike?

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman from North Carolina will permit me to answer the interrogation of the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. KEATING (continuing). I will state my position. I do not believe that the interests of this country can be advanced by putting into law the thought that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] expressed on the floor to-day, which is that this bill should be so amended as to prevent workmen from combining for the purpose of quitting work. Our labor problems, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, are being very ably handled by the executive branch of this Government——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. KEATING (continuing). And I prefer to permit Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States, to continue to work out the various phases of this issue in the way that he has decided to be the best way, rather than toss this apple of discord, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is the creator, into the industrial problems of this country.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I am opposed to conscripting labor because our experience has shown it is unnecessary. In my judgment, it would be a monumental blunder.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. So far as I know and believe, in recent days Mr. Gompers is doing what he can to control a great body of men, so far as a man can by influence control them. There is a great body of men that he does not control.

Mr. KEATING. Oh, but the trouble with the gentleman from Illinois is that when he talks in this House about controling the Industrial Workers of the World he is merely indulging in camouflage. His idea is to control all classes of labor in this country—those who would not think of joining the Workers of the World—and deprive them of essential rights. This bill does not apply to the Industrial Workers of the World, and the gentleman's amendment is not confined to that obnoxious organization.

Mr. CANNON. I would control everybody in the United States that does anything by conspiracy to disable us from supporting the boys in the trenches. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I hope that we can agree on this amendment by adding the words which have been suggested.

Mr. CANNON. If I can get the gentleman to just sit down and fix the amendment.

Mr. WEBB. I can suggest the amendment if the Clerk can get it.

Mr. CANNON. The amendment to the amendment?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

The SPEAKER. What is it the gentleman from North Carolina suggests?

Mr. WEBB. I want to add the following words before that amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman offering an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it to the Clerk.

Mr. WEBB. I want to suggest this, Mr. Speaker:

or whoever with intent to obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war——

The SPEAKER. Where does that come in?

Mr. WEBB. Immediately after the word "defined," in line 15, and just ahead of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. It is an amendment to his amendment then?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from North Carolina permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WEBB. Of course.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Your amendment ought to come in after the word "or" in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WEBB. Yes. And then the language:

or whoever with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall conspire to prevent—

And so forth.

Mr. CANNON. I accept the amendment.

Mr. WEBB. I hope we can get out of it in that way.

The SPEAKER. Now, the Clerk will read these two amendments together, each a part of the same thing, and see how they will read, the Webb amendment and the Cannon amendment hitched together.

The Clerk read as follows:

or whoever with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall conspire to prevent the erection or production of such war premises, war material or war utility.

Mr. CANNON. I am satisfied with that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Now, the whole business will be voted on at once, then.

Mr. CANNON. I accept the amendment if there is no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Before the House votes on this proposition I think we should have from the gentleman from North Carolina his idea of what this amendment accomplishes. It is just possible that personally I may fully agree with the gentleman. I will say that if the amendment carries out the thought that I think is in the mind of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I would not agree to it.

Mr. CANNON. My mind is mine, and the language speaks for itself.

Mr. KEATING. What is it the gentleman from North Carolina believes the amendment would accomplish?

Mr. WEBB. It means this, that wherever two or more persons conspire or agree together not to construct or manufacture any war materials and that conspiracy is formed for the purpose of injuring and delaying or interfering with the carrying on of the war, those persons shall be deemed guilty of a crime.

Mr. BUTLER. If the purpose is to injure or interfere with our preparation for the war.

Mr. WEBB. I have just stated that.

The SPEAKER. The vote when it is taken will be taken on the combined Cannon and Webb amendments, they being considered as one. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The Committee on the Judiciary, when they gave consideration to this measure, which I understand was drafted by the Department of Justice, had in mind the punishment of anybody who would willfully injure or destroy war material, or war premises, or utilities used in connection with war material, or other purposes. Now, you are called upon here to vote upon an amendment that a great many of us are not clear upon. I do not know as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is entirely clear in his mind as to what his amendment would accomplish if adopted.

I have in my mind pretty clearly what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] intends to accomplish. I think he has frankly stated his position to the House. I think, however, if you adopt the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois and amended by the chairman of the committee, that you will do more to disarrange the plan that the Government of the United States has had in mind regarding coordination and cooperation of labor in the production of war materials, both for our own armies and the armies of our allies, than anything that can possibly be done.

You are going to hold over the head of men and women engaged in the production—that is, on private contracts for the Government of the United States—the threat of punishment by penal statute, providing they get together for the purpose of improving their condition.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. NOLAN. Oh, yes! It is conspiracy if they get together for the purpose of improving their conditions and striking to improve those conditions. There is no question about that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. No; I have only five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. NOLAN. No; I am not in error. I think I know what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] proposes to accomplish, and he has frankly stated it.

Now, you have in the District of Columbia, in this city, meeting to-day, five representatives of employers and five representatives of organized labor, with Mr. Taft representing the employers and Mr. Frank P. Walsh representing labor. They were gotten together here for the purpose of formulating a plan whereby strikes will be discontinued during the war, so that the workers will produce munitions and materials to supply our armies in the field without cessation of work. They have gotten together to formulate some plan, and I think they will succeed. You have got a wage-adjustment board connected with the Emergency Fleet Corporation that settled the strike question on the Pacific coast. They have recently rendered a decision along the Delaware River that affects fifty or sixty thousand men. They are going to New York next week, and the week after they will be on the North Atlantic coast, and the week after that they will be on the South Atlantic coast. When they hand down their decisions I am satisfied you will not have any trouble in the shipyards of the country.

I am satisfied that if you permit the Government of the United States to work out this labor problem you will have no trouble in war industries. But if you want to stir this thing up, if you want to hold over organized labor in this country the threat of jail simply because they might strike to better their conditions while working for a private employer who has got a Government contract, whether it be at Hog Island or at some other place, no matter what conditions the employer may impose on labor, I think you will disarrange the whole program. I think if this Congress, or some committee of Congress, wants to settle this question, they ought to do it in committee; they ought to allow those who have given time and attention to the subject an opportunity to come before the committee and have a free and frank discussion of the whole subject.

Let us find out what the Government itself proposes. Let the men who are handling the labor problem for the Government handle this question, tell us what legislation is needed, and then it is time for Congress to act. But here you are asked, with 10 or 15 minutes' discussion, to adopt an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], supplemented by another amendment by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that if adopted will seriously disarrange your entire labor program during the war. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-one Members are present, a quorum. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MORGAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. MORGAN. I rise to move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat surprised at the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who has this bill in charge, who seemed to agree to this amendment as modified.

Mr. WEBB. I did not agree to it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] accepted it. I said I had no objection if he would accept it. It harmonizes with the rest of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Then, I will modify my statement and say I was somewhat surprised that he should agree to the modification. In other words, I think this House has the impression now that this amendment as modified meets with the approval of the Committee on the Judiciary. That is my impression.

Now, I will say that I recognize the chairman's right to do that, generally, speaking, but I think where an amendment is offered to an important bill like this, covering an entirely new field, that brings in questions that were not involved in the original bill, which broadens the scope of the original bill, that it is not usual for the chairman of the committee, without much discussion, to virtually concede such an amendment.

Now, I am opposed to this amendment. In the first place, if we are to make a new law, a new criminal statute, which affects the right of labor to strike, we should consider it very carefully, very thoroughly, and very patriotically.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman believe that organized labor or any other body of men or women in this country should be given the right to strike and destroy the instruments of production and munition plants? [Applause.]

Mr. MORGAN. I believe that labor has the right to strike. [Applause.] I believe that at present labor, as a rule, is as loyal to the Government as capital. I believe that it is unwise to enact the legislation included in this amendment at this time.

It may be wise for the House here, with very little discussion, with practically no consideration, to authorize the courts of this land to indict every man who enters into a strike during the war; but I do not believe that that is wise. I have never posed as the champion of organized labor. There are others in this House more entitled to that position than I. But, at the same time, I do not think it is necessary for the Congress of the United States at this time to authorize the courts of the United States to prosecute every man connected with organized labor who strikes. [Applause.]

We can not win this war without the sympathy and support of the laboring men of this country. By this I mean all the men in our mills, factories, manufacturing plants, in the operation of our railways, on our farms, and in all our industrial establishments. These men are performing the labor necessary to clothe, feed, equip, arm, and maintain the soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy.

Not only this, perhaps 90 per cent of our soldiers and sailors go from the homes of the laboring classes of the country. Certainly we ought not to question the loyalty and patriotism of these men by hastily adopting an amendment which might be used to intimidate or prosecute and possibly to convict men who may have a just cause to strike even in war times. I have no sympathy with any man, whoever he may be or whatever may be his calling or occupation, who interferes with the American people in the prosecution of the war. I am willing to vote for any legislation that will mete out proper punishment for such men. But I am not willing to vote for a "conspiracy" provision which might be construed to interfere with the just rights of labor now so universally recognized. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, I have supported every measure designed to strengthen the arm of the Government in the great struggle in which we are engaged. As a Representative, I am anxious to contribute in every way possible to aid our brave soldiers and sailors to win the war. I desire to lighten their burdens, to lessen their sacrifices, and to relieve them of every danger and hardship possible. But I do not believe a conspiracy statute, applicable to labor generally, without proper safeguards thrown around it, will aid our Army or our Navy or contribute to our national strength in this hour of peril and danger.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that all debate on this amendment be now closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that all debate on this amendment be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is withdrawn. The question is on the joint amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. NOLAN) there were—ayes 112, noes 45.

Mr. NOLAN and Mr. KEATING made the point of order that there was no quorum present.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Chair just counted. I think that point of order is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The point of order is made that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and three Members present, not a quorum. On the rising vote the ayes were 112, the noes were 45——

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. When can we demand and obtain a roll call?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will get it in about half a minute. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. WINGO. May we have the amendment reported, Mr. Speaker? Let me suggest that as the section is short, the entire section be read as it would be if this amendment were adopted.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the entire section, with the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That when the United States is at war, whoever, with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, or whoever, with reason to believe that his act may injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall willfully injure or destroy, or shall attempt to so injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or war utilities as herein defined, or whoever with intent to injure, interfere with, or obstruct the United States or any associate nation in preparing for or carrying on the war, shall conspire to prevent the erection or production of such war premises, war material, or war utilities, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisonment not more than 30 years, or both.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. As I understood the amendment, it used the word "obstruct"; as the section was just read I understood that the words used were "interfere with."

Mr. CANNON. The word "interfere" is in the text as it was reported, if the gentleman will look at the top of section 2.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. All right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 257, nays 59, not voting 112, as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the previous question.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw that motion and allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] to offer an amendment.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new section to follow section 2:

"Nothing herein shall be construed as making it unlawful for employees to agree together to stop work or not to enter thereon with a bona fide purpose of securing better wages or conditions of employment."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this amendment is not in order, and I insist on the point of order. I believe it ought to be sustained, because there is nothing in this bill that refers to employees or labor or wages or conditions; it only applies to conspiracies and doing certain things for the purpose of injuring or interfering with the Government in prosecuting the war. I can not see how the amendment is germane. You might as well write into the bill that it is not intended to catch an honest man. True, some gentlemen have mentioned labor on the floor, but there is nothing in the bill referring to labor, employees, or conditions of labor.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, but this amendment just placed upon the bill does speak of conspiracy. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from New York is only, as I understand it, to explain that this shall not apply in this way, so it seems to me that if the amendment which has just been placed upon the bill is in order it would not do to say that this amendment is not in order. It might have been so if this amendment had not been first placed upon the bill, but having been placed upon the bill and voted on by the House, it seems to me that this amendment is now in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. This amendment is simply a limitation on this bill, and the point of order is overruled. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that we are considering the bill under the five-minute rule, and the motion is not in order until the Clerk finishes the reading of the bill for amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. The bill has been read.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. By unanimous consent it was agreed that we should consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been read.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. We have just had read the second section for amendment. We have not had read the third section under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FOSTER. The whole bill has been read.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But not since that agreement was made.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is in order.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seem to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. LANGLEY) there were—ayes 93, noes 69.

Mr. CANNON. Yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] demands the yeas and nays. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-five gentlemen have arisen, a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 273, nays 38, answered "present" 1, not voting 116, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I shall want but one minute of that time.

The bill seeks merely to limit the right of Federal judges in the trial of causes submitted to juries. In some jurisdictions—at least, it is true of my own—the court elects to give his personal opinion as to the credibility of witnesses and the weight of testimony, and it was thought that it invaded the province of the jury. This bill seeks to correct that, and to make the judge confine his instructions to the law applicable to the case.

That is all I want to say at this time.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 7, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

THURSDAY, March 7, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom. Thy mercies extend to all generations. Thou art not a respecter of persons. Thou dost embrace all mankind in Thy loving-kindness and in Thy favor. We are saddened by the sinfulness of men. We are perplexed by evil influences that are constantly about us. Many are impelled by selfish motives and pride. We pray that Thy Holy Spirit may sanctify the hearts of the people to respond more fully to the Divine will, that we may walk in Thy way and accomplish all of Thy Divine purpose in us as a Nation. For Christ's sake. Amen.

REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3405) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 301) thereon.

FOX RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 7998) granting the consent of Congress to the village of East Dundee and the village of West Dundee to construct a bridge across the Fox River, and I submit a report (No. 302) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 4024) for the relief of the Indians on Fort Peck Reservation in Montana; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 4025) granting an increase of pension to Webster A. Whiting; and

A bill (S. 4026) granting a pension to George A. Atkinson; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 4027) granting a pension to Edwin C. Gasque; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH:

FORT PECK INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment providing that Indians of the Fort Peck Reservation in Montana entitled to allotments under existing laws may select lands classified as coal and receive patents therefor in accordance with the act of May 30, 1908, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REQUISITION OF TIMBER.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3426) to empower the President to requisition timber and timber products for war purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the morning business is closed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, the so-called war finance corporation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is an amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] on page 11 of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I see that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is not in the Chamber, and there is a very small attendance of Senators. I think, on account of the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma and the small attendance, it would be well to have a roll call. I therefore make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Henderson	New	Smith, Mich.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent owing to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, beginning with line 5, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Such bonds may be dealt in by Federal reserve banks in the same manner and to the same extent as bonds or notes of the United States not bearing the circulation privilege, and.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Federal reserve act——

Mr. SIMMONS. As I indicated on yesterday, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. If it is accepted, I do not care to submit anything in explanation of the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have an explanation of it before the Senate accepts it.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be very glad to give it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say that I think the Senator from Oklahoma gave an explanation of it yesterday.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Federal reserve act provided that the reserves of the member banks, which comprises all the national banks of the United States and all the large State banks and State trust companies, should have their gold reserves cared for and protected by the Federal reserve banks. These banks hold all the gold practically which the various member banks have for their reserves against the demands of the depositors of the banks of the United States. Those deposits amount to enormous sums, very many billions of dollars, and those depositors ought not to have their confidence shaken in the security of the reserves which are held against the payment of those deposits.

Moreover, the gold which is held in the reserve banks is held there as a basis upon which to issue Federal reserve notes on a basis of 40 per cent of gold against each dollar of Federal reserve notes. That expensive policy of the Federal reserve banks is based upon the quantity of gold which they have.

This provision permits the bonds of this corporation to be substituted for the gold which is held as the reserve of the banks of the country against their deposits, and anything which would weaken the confidence of the depositors of the country in the Federal Reserve System might lead to the most unhappy results.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the purpose of the amendment is to give added protection to the depositors?

Mr. OWEN. The purpose of the amendment is to protect the depositors, and by protecting the depositors and protecting the Federal Reserve System to protect the credit system of the United States, without which this war can not be successfully waged. I think that is perfectly obvious.

Mr. GALLINGER. The latter part of it I do not know anything about.

Mr. OWEN. I think the Senator will agree with me when he considers it, because if the credit system is disturbed in the United States it would be the most serious injury to the conduct of the war.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no question about that. What particularly attracted my attention was that this is in the interest of the depositors in banks.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, for that reason it ought to be agreed to, beyond a doubt.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Does the Senator claim that the words he desires to have stricken out authorize those banks to issue currency without having 40 per cent of gold back of it?

Mr. OWEN. No; not at all. The part I am asking to have stricken out permits the banks to buy these bonds and take their gold to buy them with.

Mr. MCCUMBER. There is nothing mentioned about gold in that particular provision.

Mr. OWEN. No; nothing is mentioned of gold, but that is what they have to buy the bonds with. They have to buy them with the gold they have if they buy them at all.

Such bonds may be dealt in by Federal reserve banks in the same manner and to the same extent as bonds or notes of the United States not bearing the circulating privilege.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I understand the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. My understanding is—and I wish to ask the Senator if I am correct—that under the Federal reserve act the reserve banks are permitted to use the deposits of the member banks for the purchase of Government bonds. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; the Senator is correct in that.

Mr. SIMMONS. This amendment would not permit them to use the gold of member banks to purchase the bonds of the corporation to be created?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; that is right.

Mr. SIMMONS. But they would still have the right to use that fund for the purchase of liberty bonds?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; that is right.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the Senator, I understand, differentiates between liberty bonds and the bonds of this corporation?

Mr. OWEN. Very widely; and I wish to explain why I so differentiate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma tell us where the amendment which he is discussing comes in the bill?

Mr. OWEN. It is on page 11, line 5.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May we have order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must appeal to the Senate to assist in preserving sufficient order so that Senators addressing the Senate may be heard.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to add, if the Senator from Oklahoma will permit me, that I heard his statement of the differentiation which he made on yesterday in this matter, and I am inclined to think that it is well founded.

Mr. OWEN. There is a very important differentiation between the bonds of the United States and the bonds of this corporation. The bonds of the United States are very widely scattered in private hands; they are not very active in the market; and there would be no urgent demand on the Federal reserve banks to take the bonds of the United States in exchange for their gold; but in this bill we are providing for $4,000,000,000 of these corporation bonds to assist corporations that have difficulty in renewing their maturing obligations. Those bonds will go into the financial centers in very large amounts; those who are interested in those financial centers will bring pressure to bear upon the directors of the Federal reserve banks to accommodate them by taking over those bonds and it would be a hazard to the Federal Reserve System to have the directors subjected to a pressure of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to give my very cordial support to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. The actual quantity of free gold now in the Federal reserve banks is only about $600,000,000. I not only believe it would be unwise to use any portion of that fund for investment in these bonds, but I very much doubt the wisdom of using it to buy any bonds. I certainly am pleased, therefore, to join in excluding these bonds from purchase by the Federal reserve banks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let the amendment be stated. Some of us have come in from committees since the amendment was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, beginning in line 5, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

Such bonds may be dealt in by Federal reserve banks in the same manner and to the same extent as bonds or notes of the United States not bearing the circulation privilege, and.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have been working in committee and have not therefore had the benefit of the discussion which has taken place in reference to this amendment. I am very fearful that if adopted the amendment will seriously cripple the usefulness of the organization which we are about to create. This corporation, in fact, is to be a great bank, in the sense that it is to procure funds to take care of the maturing obligations of many great concerns and small concerns which can not get money because the Government has applied so powerful a suction to the financial market in order to get money for its bonds that it is necessary to come to the relief of the financial market. The money which this corporation is to obtain is to be largely obtained from the sale of its bonds. Now, the very first thing it is proposed to do is to limit the use to which those bonds may be put. When that is done you impair their sale in the market and you almost certainly advance the interest charge.

While I generally agree with my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] on matters concerning banking legislation, I believe it is unwise to undertake to float four thousand million dollars of securities and to discredit them to a certain extent in advance by refusing them the privilege of being handled through the Federal reserve banks and having all the privileges of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Missouri evidently misunderstands the purpose of the amendment. It does not provide that these bonds may not be used as collateral for notes coming through member banks to the Federal reserve banks for discount. They may come in that way. The only purpose of the amendment is to require that the gold held by the reserve banks shall not be directly used in buying these bonds and substituting these bonds for that gold.

Mr. REED. But this amendment, in my judgment, goes much further than that. It strikes the language out of the bill which gives to these bonds certain privileges, and to that extent discredits the bonds.

Mr. OWEN. If the Senator will read the words remaining in the bill immediately following the words proposed to be stricken out, on page 11, he will find that these bonds, although an investment security, are given a very extraordinary status of being used as a basis for the issuance of Federal reserve notes when they are indorsed by a member bank.

Mr. REED. Well——

Mr. OWEN. The Senator will observe that following the words which I have moved to strike out there appears this language:

> Federal reserve banks shall be authorized, subject to the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to rediscount and purchase paper and make advances secured by such bonds in the same manner and to the same extent and at the same rates or at such higher rates as the Federal Reserve Board may approve, as they may purchase or rediscount paper or make advances secured by such bonds or notes of the United States under authority of the Federal reserve act.

That really accomplishes, I think, what the Senator has in mind. I think that he rather misunderstood the scope of the proposed amendment.

Mr. REED. As I stated, I am under the disadvantage of coming in after the discussion has taken place in part. The proposition, however, is to strike out—

> Such bonds may be dealt in by Federal reserve banks in the same manner and to the same extent as bonds or notes of the United States not bearing the circulation privilege, and.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I now remind the Senator that we provided in the Federal reserve act that these banks might buy the bonds of the United States directly and use their gold for that purpose, which they have done to a limited degree.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is, Mr. President, the gold of the member banks, as I understand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. OWEN. The gold held by the Federal reserve banks against the reserves of the member banks.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It does not make any difference whether it is gold held against the member banks or gold held against anything else; it is their gold.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; it is their gold.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And they can invest it in Government bonds.

Mr. OWEN. It is their gold; yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The object of this amendment is to provide that they shall not invest their surplus gold in the bonds of the proposed corporation.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; and they ought not to be allowed to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think to-day it would be very unwise for them to invest their surplus gold in any bonds.

Mr. OWEN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They need it for the broader purposes of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. OWEN. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And those provisions were put in the bill originally that they might be used in case of a surplus of money and a lack of demand.

Mr. OWEN. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To-day we have an extreme demand and a limited surplus.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And this is no time for them to be investing their gold in bonds.

Mr. OWEN. And it is not necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Therefore I gladly join in not providing this additional opportunity to invest their gold in bonds.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if it would be possible to let this amendment lie over and take up another matter and return to it in the course of half an hour?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection, if the Senator from Oklahoma does not object.

Mr. OWEN. I have no objection.

Mr. REED. I should like to have an opportunity to compare it with the Federal reserve act.

Mr. OWEN. I have no objection.

Mr. REED. Then let the amendment be passed over temporarily.

Mr. OWEN. I temporarily withdraw the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. I send to the desk an amendment which was printed last night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section in the bill the following:

> SEC. 2. That any applicant for a loan or advance under this act who shall knowingly make any false statement in his application for such loan or advance, and any member of a loan committee who shall willfully overvalue any security for loans or advances under this act, shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.
> Any person who shall falsely make, forge, or counterfeit, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited, or willingly aid or assist in falsely making, forging, or counterfeiting any bond, coupon, or paper in imitation of, or purporting to be in imitation of, the bonds or coupons issued by the Corporation; or any person who shall pass, utter, or publish, or attempt to pass, utter, or publish any false, forged, or counterfeited bond, coupon, or paper purporting to be issued by the Corporation, knowing the same to be falsely made, forged, or counterfeited; or whoever shall falsely alter, or cause or procure to be falsely altered, or shall willingly aid or assist in falsely altering any such bond, coupon, or paper, or shall pass, utter, or publish as true any falsely altered or spurious bond, coupon, or paper issued, or purporting to have been issued, by the Corporation, knowing the same to be falsely altered or spurious, shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both.
> Any person connected in any capacity with the Corporation who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any moneys, funds, or credits thereof, or who without authority from the directors draws any order, assigns any note, bond, draft, mortgage, judgment, or decree thereof, or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of the Corporation with intent in either case to defraud the Corporation, or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual, or to deceive any officer of the Corporation, and any person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, clerk, or agent in any violation of this section, shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both.
> The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to direct and use the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department to detect, arrest, and deliver into custody of the United States marshal having jurisdiction any person or persons violating any of the provisions of this section.

Mr. HOLLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I want to suggest the manifest conflict between some of the provisions of the proposed amendment and section 8 as we adopted it yesterday, particularly with regard to the amount and extent of the penalty.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, under this bill we are about to organize a corporation which will have public funds of the United States in effect, although not in name. The corporation will perform a banking business; it will receive a capital from the Government of $500,000,000. That $500,000,000 is supplied to the corporation as capital, and it will be absolutely the property of the corporation. Under the laws as they now exist anyone could steal the entire $500,000,000 of capital and not be punished under any statute or by any court or officer of the United States. It might be possible, if the corporation had a branch in some State and its money were stolen or embezzled, that the culprit might be convicted under some State statute, but the courts of the United States and officers of the United States could not prosecute such a person.

The national banks have been created under a special statute and in that statute there is a provision for punishing embezzlement or misapplication of funds. The same is true of the farm loan banks. I prepared this amendment yesterday after looking over the other statutes, and I think it will answer the purpose.

The penalties are made much more severe than in the case cited by the distinguished Senator from Colorado, because it is a much more serious offense to steal large sums than it is to disobey regulations of the noncriminal provisions of a statute.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not objecting to the Senator's proposed amendment, but section 8 was written so as to apply to every violation of the provisions of the act, and, if we adopt both the section proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire and the one we adopted yesterday, there certainly will be a manifest conflict with regard to the penalty. I think, therefore, section 8 should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. I understand that the amendment to section 8 will again be considered when the bill gets into the Senate, and at that time we can doubtless make the two sections compatible. I will look at section 8 with that in view.

Mr. THOMAS. I want also to suggest to the Senator before he takes his seat what seems to me to be largely an immateriality in that part of his proposed amendment which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to use the Secret Service of the Government in the detection of offenses that may be committed under the law. Would he not have that right, anyhow? Is not that one of the duties of the Secret Service as now organized?

Mr. HOLLIS. My attention was called to that provision by a member of the Treasury Department, and I was informed that the Secretary of the Treasury would not have that authority unless it were expressly conferred for this purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have examined very carefully the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. Until the Senator stated upon the floor on yesterday that the Federal laws would not be sufficient to authorize a prosecution for forgery of the bonds of this corporation or embezzlement of its funds, I was under the impression that the law was otherwise. Whether this be a corporation organized under the laws of the United States for private or public purposes, I was under the impression that there was authority of law for the prosecution of forgery and embezzlement of the character described in the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. Until his statement was made, I did not have any doubt that in the creation of a corporation of this kind, in which the Federal Government would be the sole stockholder—and it therefore would own the corporation, and the bonds of the corporation would be its property—there was ample authority to punish offenses of the character described in the amendment against the property of that corporation. The Senator from New Hampshire assured the Senate that he had investigated the matter and that there was no such authority. I have not had time myself to investigate it. Assuming that the Senator is right, of course this legislation is necessary, and for that reason I shall accept the amendment.

I can not see the force of the suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. Section 8 of the bill simply punishes violations of the provisions of the act. There is no provision in this act with reference to embezzlement of any kind. That is not one of the provisions of the act.

Mr. THOMAS. No; but, Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a substantive thing growing out of the wrongdoing of some officer with reference to the funds of the bank or with reference to the bonds of the bank.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I shall be through in just a moment. I think this merely provides that offenses of this character shall be punished by a heavy penalty, while violations of the ordinary provisions of the act shall be punished by a lighter penalty.

I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if a general law or a law in general terms provides specific penalties for the violation of certain portions of it, and is then followed by a section which provides a penalty to be inflicted upon any person who violates any of the provisions of the act, and the penalty in the general clause differs from the penalty in the specific one, and especially if the penalty in the general clause is milder, less severe, than the specific one, that will be the penalty inflicted by the courts upon a violation of any of the provisions of the act. I think that is a proposition which every lawyer will accept without a question. In the construction of criminal laws, where any doubt exists, the doubt will be construed in favor of the milder penalty, or the milder construction will be given if the words of the statute are susceptible of it.

The Senator from North Carolina would be correct in his criticism of my objection if section 8 were specifically limited to all other violations than those mentioned in this proposed section 2. If not, then in the event of a violation of the act, followed by a conviction, the maximum penalty will be $1,000 and one year's imprisonment. Consequently, I think one or the other should be eliminated.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has given specific attention to the need of the amendment which he has offered, and which he says is essential in the event we propose to punish the specific class of offenses to which it refers. I am perfectly willing to take his statement upon that subject. He has given it his personal attention. He is an excellent lawyer, and he has come to that conclusion; but I certainly must protest against incorporating that amendment in this bill and at the same time leaving section 8 as it is now framed.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, yesterday, when the amendment to section 8 was under consideration, no Senator was able to tell of any offense that might be punishable under it. I have tried to think of one myself, and I can not. I therefore suggest to the Senate that each Member try to think of something that might be covered by it; and if none is suggested when we are considering section 8 in the Senate—as it will be considered—we can strike out section 8, and leave this section in place of it. I make that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to renew now the proposed amendment on page 11, to strike out, in lines 5 to 8, the words:

> Such bonds may be dealt in by Federal reserve banks in the same manner and to the same extent as bonds or notes of the United States not bearing the circulating privilege, and——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I will state that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has already agreed to that amendment, and has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. I was simply going to suggest the absence of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. OWEN. I spoke to the Senator from Missouri about it, and he withdraws his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I move to strike out the balance of section 6 immediately following the part that has just been stricken out; that is, on page 11, I move to strike out all after line 8, and, on page 12, I move to strike out the first 12 lines.

I will read the part that it is proposed to strike out, beginning with line 9, on page 11:

> Federal reserve banks shall be authorized, subject to the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to rediscount and purchase paper and make advances secured by such bonds in the same manner and to the same extent and at the same rates or at such higher rates as the Federal Reserve Board may approve, as they may purchase or rediscount paper or make advances secured by such bonds or notes of the United States under authority of the Federal reserve act. Any Federal reserve bank acquiring by purchase or rediscount such paper secured by the bonds of the Corporation may, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, use such paper so acquired for any purpose for which it is authorized to use paper secured by such bonds or notes of the United States: Provided, however, That whenever Federal reserve notes are issued against the security of such paper the Federal Reserve Board may make a special interest charge on such notes, which, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, need not be applicable to other Federal reserve notes which may from time to time be issued and outstanding. All provisions of law not inconsistent herewith in respect to the purchase or rediscount by any Federal reserve bank of paper secured by such bonds or notes of the United States and in respect to Federal reserve notes issued against the security of such paper shall extend, in so far as applicable, to the purchase or rediscount of paper secured by the bonds of the Corporation and to the Federal reserve notes issued against the security of such paper.

This is a very important amendment to the Federal reserve act, and in order that the Senate may know just how it affects the act I will explain briefly the reasons for enacting the Federal reserve act.

We had been for a century acting under banking laws which did not provide for the mobilization of banking reserves. Each bank kept its own reserves, in part in its own vaults and in part with reserve banks in other cities. There was no mobilization. In case of a panic, when there were sudden calls on any bank to meet its liabilities, its reserves were insufficient for the purpose. We provided, therefore, that there should be 12 reserve banks; that the major part of the reserves of the national banks or State banks becoming members of the system should be kept in the Federal reserve banks; and the Federal reserve banks now have about a billion and a half of reserves belonging to member banks of the system. Those reserves are not reserves unless they are kept in liquid form; that is, when pressure comes on the banks, through panic or otherwise, these reserves must be in shape to respond immediately and effectively to the call for funds. If they are locked up in securities, however safe, but not liquid, they can not meet the call for reserves.

The resources of the Federal reserve banks are very limited anyway. They have only about $73,000,000 of capital; and that is a very insignificant item compared with the financial transactions of this country. Then, they have the billion and a half of reserves. That is all that the Federal reserve banks have to buy anything with. Their earnings are inconsiderable. They can not receive deposits from anyone, and all the money they have with which to buy bonds or other securities is comprised in these two items—their capital of $73,000,000 and their reserves.

There was long consideration given to the subject of what reserves should be invested in. Some thought they should be invested in some things; some thought they should be invested in other things; and the Federal reserve act was finally predicated upon the proposition that the reserves should be invested only in commercial paper of short maturity. Later an excrescence was permitted on that law to the effect that they might invest a certain amount of the reserves in Government bonds, and the reason advanced for that was that Government bonds, as a rule, have a quasi-liquid character; that is, they are quickly salable on the market.

The advantage of notes based on commercial transactions is that if the commercial transaction is short, when it is completed the security will pay itself out. That is, it is self-liquidating. If a merchant buys a bill of goods, in 90 days he will probably have turned them over, so that out of the proceeds of sale he can pay his note, and it works in this way:

A member bank discounts for a merchant his note at 90 days or less. The member bank is then allowed to rediscount that note with the Federal reserve bank, and the Federal reserve bank is allowed to advance to the member bank part of the reserves of the system. When that note becomes due, if the maker of the note is able to meet it, the obligation is canceled, the member bank gets its money, the Federal reserve bank gets its money, and the reserves remain intact.

Under the bill as it stands, if a member bank desires to obtain money from a Federal reserve bank, it may give its own obligation, not necessarily secured by a commercial note, but secured by Government bonds, and the bank may rediscount that obligation. After the Federal reserve bank has discounted paper in this way for a member bank, it may make that paper the basis for the issue of Federal reserve notes or currency, and the great merit of the Federal reserve note as currency rests upon the fact that it is based on self-liquidated short-time paper.

I appreciated the beauties of linking a new banking system to the Federal Reserve System and obtaining access to the quick commercial capital of the country, and I had inserted in the farm-loan act when it passed the Senate exactly this same provision. I thought that was the best way for the farmer to turn his long-term investment security into a quick capital asset. The matter was particularly called to the attention of the Senate; but when it got over to the House, the House Committee on Banking and Currency refused to agree to it. The House followed their suggestion, and when the matter went into conference I was met with the most earnest resistance on the part of the House Banking and Currency Committee. I yielded that proposition, the last one that I yielded, and I only yielded it because I was convinced that it was essentially unsound.

We enact a law for a Federal Reserve System in times of peace, when we can view things quietly, and rig the ship so that it will go through a storm. You can not get your ship rigged for a storm when the storm is on. Your judgment is not good. The time to prepare a safe ship is in times of calm. We prepared the Federal Reserve System so that it should be safe. We made it safe, and we did not suppose that after the country had been in war less than one year, when the banks were full of money, and when the credit of the United States is good, some one would want to tinker with the Federal reserve act and make some drain upon it that we did not approve when we were looking at the matter calmly.

This is an inroad on the Federal Reserve System. I became satisfied of that when the farm-loan act was under consideration. I did not believe the privilege of rediscounting securities based on farm-loan bonds would be carried out enough to imperil the system. I did not think it would be dangerous. In practice, I was not afraid of it; but I did think it would be a most dangerous precedent, and because it is now being urged in this case to a very serious extent, perhaps to the extent of four billions, I urge the Senate to consider the matter thoroughly before it adopts this provision.

The powers given under this bill, as everyone admits, are very, very great. They contain elements of the greatest danger to the financial system of the country. This corporation is given authority to issue $5,000,000,000 of these bonds. Currency may be issued on the strength of those bonds to the extent of $2,000,000,000 in excess of the billion and a quarter which is now outstanding. The Federal Reserve System was not established for the purpose of converting long-term securities, even Government securities, into quick capital for capital purposes. The Federal Reserve System was established to make our commercial banks safe and valuable to the country. This has no tendency to make them safe. It has every tendency to endanger their solvency.

I hope the matter will be thoroughly debated and that we shall have the views of Senators on the floor who are familiar with the Federal reserve act. I do not want to make a long fight on it. I want to put it squarely before the Senate, and I shall hope for an intelligent vote upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire will not be adopted. The section of the bill that he proposes to strike out, at least a part of the section that he proposes to strike out, is vital to this measure. It is so regarded, I think, by every member of the committee. It is so regarded, I am sure, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

It is true, as the Senator says, that the Federal reserve act only permits Federal reserve banks to discount commercial paper and Government bonds, and only permits those two classes of securities to be used as a basis of Federal note issue.

In order to make these bonds salable, in order to make them perform the purpose and office contemplated in the act, it is proposed that the bonds of this corporation so far as the right of the Federal reserve banks to discount them, so far as their being the basis of note issue, shall be placed upon a parity in these banks with commercial paper and Government bonds.

If this section of the bill is stricken out the bill will be undermined, its purpose will be largely defeated, the liquidity of its bonds will be in a measure affected, and it will be fatal, in my judgment, to the legislation proposed.

Mr. President, the Senator is entirely right in saying that the principle of the Federal reserve act is to require these banks to deal only in liquid securities, commercial paper. Ninety-day commercial paper is liquid security. The Federal reserve act recognizes Government bonds as liquid security, not because they will be due in 90 days but because there is a ready market for them. It is anticipated that there will be a ready market for these bonds also, and that they will be of as liquid a character substantially as Government bonds, and that in no way will the general principle of the Federal reserve act, which requires the banks to confine their operations to liquid securities be impaired or undermined.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been a good deal impressed by the fear that there might possibly be some danger to the Federal Reserve System if we legislate in such a way that it would have a tendency to disturb the liquidity. Of course, the Senator realizes that that would be a very dangerous thing to do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, that is exactly what we are trying to avoid. The Senator suggested the other day, if he will pardon me, that we might amend the Federal reserve act and permit securities of these industrial corporations and war factories to be discounted by the Federal reserve bank. If we had done that we would have undoubtedly destroyed the liquidity of their securities. But we do not do that. We require that before those can be utilized at all they must be converted into the bonds of this corporation. If the bonds of this corporation will not be liquid, then they will not be of any value at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that. I wish to ask the Senator further, does he think that the change of the securities of the private corporation that is getting assistance through the instrumentality of this corporation that we have organized into the long-time bonds of this corporation——

Mr. SIMMONS. They are not long-time bonds. They are not less than one year nor more than five years; they are short-term bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. Say, for a year, that would not be considered liquid in the ordinary commercial sense.

Mr. SIMMONS. If a Government bond——

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator I can see a reason why this should be done. Of course, I think it would make these bonds more valuable, and I would not like to do anything that would destroy their value; but at the same time I do not believe that these bonds are ever going to be as liquid as Government bonds. If they are liquid, it is because they will sell on the market, and not because of their maturity. That is the reason why a Government bond is liquid, if it is liquid. It is because it has a ready sale. You can convert it into money. Commercial paper is liquid because it matures and the theory is that it will be paid when due, not exceeding four years. That attribute of liquidity to these bonds certainly can not be applied, because they will probably run four or five years before they are due; at least, they will have to run one year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator will pardon me, unless he is through.

Mr. NORRIS. I am asking the Senator for information.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is expected that these bonds will stand in the markets of the country very largely upon a parity with Government bonds.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] the other day in discussing this matter indicated his opinion that the interests upon these bonds should not be materially different, if at all different, from that of the liberty bonds. I suppose that was based upon the theory that they would be a very attractive class of securities. The bonds themselves have back of them two things which give them strength. First, they have behind them, in a moral sense at least, the responsibility of the United States Government; and, secondly, they have behind them, as a rule, when they have been exchanged for other securities, the obligation of the corporation and the securities which the corporation puts up in order to secure an exchange of their securities into these bonds.

Now, they do not run as long as liberty bonds. They do not run as long as the average Government bond. They are of a shorter period. This is the theory of the bill, the theory of its sponsors, and the theory of the committee, and the legislation is largely based upon that theory, and if that theory is wrong, then the legislation will not be effective in accomplishing its purpose. The theory is that these bonds will command a ready sale in the market, just as United States bonds do; and as United States bonds are treated in the Federal Reserve System as liquid assets for the purpose of discount by these banks and note issues, that same quality is given to these bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield the floor. I am through.

Mr. OWEN. Before the Senator yields the floor I want to remind him and the Senate that when I said that the bonds proposed under this bill should bear 4 per cent, I coupled with it that these bonds should have the legal obligation of the Government behind them and not an implied moral obligation. I understand that there is a very substantial difference of opinion as to whether there is any moral obligation behind these bonds. I agree with the Senator from North Carolina that the Government's moral obligation will be behind these bonds for reasons which are obvious.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Government can under any conceivable circumstances become morally obligated to pay an indebtedness the Government will be obligated to pay these bonds. It is the sole property of the corporation. It is to be the beneficiary of these bonds; it alone is interested in them, and to assume for a minute that the Government would repudiate that sort of an obligation seems to me to be very far-fetched.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I agree thoroughly with the Senator from North Carolina. I regard the Government as absolutely behind these bonds. The only reason why they are not issued formally as Government bonds is because it would be unwise to issue Government bonds for so short a period, and it would be unwise for the Government through the Treasury to conduct this business, or, at any rate, it is deemed much wiser to conduct the business through a corporation all the stock of which is owned by the Government.

This corporation begins with $500,000,000 capital. It is required to take the best of securities for all its advances. Instead of losing money the interest that it makes on its discounts and its loans should accumulate a handsome profit. It should at least earn interest upon the $500,000,000 that the Government places with the corporation. It could only lose by reckless improvident management. As the Government makes its directors Government officers the Government is behind these bonds. I should feel as a legislator that I had undue regard for the character of my Government if I for one moment questioned the fact that the Government would see these bonds paid.

Now, Mr. President, let us come to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. I yield to no one——

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he leaves that point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to get through, but if the Senator wishes to ask a question, I would be glad to answer it.

Mr. NORRIS. I intended to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All right.

Mr. NORRIS. The only point about which I have doubt in regard to the amendment is whether the bonds of this corporation will sell in the open market as readily as Government bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think they will sell as well as Government bonds and fill a place unoccupied by Government bonds. We could not properly make our Government bonds so short as from one to five years. These bonds are prepared upon a plan of furnishing an opportunity for investment in funds that the parties desire to have mature in a shorter period than the maturity of Government bonds.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to come to the Federal reserve banks and the effect of this action upon them. I yield to no one interest in these banks. I yield to no one in the desire that these banks should be absolutely above question. Mr. President, I may be pardoned for saying that I contributed toward making them sound in the Senate as much as perhaps any other Senator. It was upon my motion that the reserve for Federal reserve notes was required to be 40 per cent instead of 25, and that the reserve as to deposits was increased from 20 to 35 per cent.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator make that clear? What does he mean by reserve?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Back of the Federal reserve notes there must be 40 per cent of actual gold kept in the Federal reserve banks. Back of the deposits by member banks there must be 35 per cent of gold or lawful money kept in the Federal reserve banks. These are the reserves of the Federal reserve banks, the one against the notes issued, the other against their deposits. It is true these amounts were fixed in the Democratic caucus, and upon the floor of the Senate they were reported as the action of the committee, but no one among Democrats was more zealous than myself in insisting that the notes issued should be limited to 2½ per cent of the gold kept in the vaults of the banks, and that 35 per cent in gold or lawful money for all deposits should always be retained in the Federal reserve banks. These two reserves are the great bulwarks of the reserve banks that preserve perpetually their strength under any reasonable management. Back of their loans, back of their deposits, back of their notes, at all times we have 35 per cent gold or lawful money reserve against deposits and 40 per cent gold reserve against reserve notes.

Now, let us come to the character of paper that they may discount. There are two kinds of paper that they may discount. The one is 90 days' paper and the other is 15 days' paper, all the paper of a member bank. No paper of a member bank can be discounted in a Federal reserve bank running for a longer maturity than 15 days, based simply upon security. The 90 days' paper is a commercial paper supposed to be in itself self-liquidating, taken by the customer of a member bank, a paper given for an actual commercial transaction or else additionally secured and rediscounted by the member bank in the Federal reserve banks for a period running not more than 90 days.

Mr. HOLLIS. If that is so, then what is the necessity of having any bonds back of it as security?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The commercial paper has no bonds back of it as security. You need not put a bond back of that paper to make it good. The paper of the member banks back of which the bonds may be placed as security can run for only 15 days.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think the Senator is a little confused there. A 90-day note in the hands of a member bank which is not based on a commercial transaction may be rediscounted, and the reserve bank has for it a Government bond as security.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I stated that the note of the member bank itself could only be a 15-day note, no matter if these bonds were given as security.

Now, Mr. President, these bonds are perfectly good. They are as good as Government bonds. We all so recognize them. They are as liquid as Government bonds, and they will be taken as security at their market and salable value. There is no requirement that the Federal reserve bank shall accept them as security at par. The Federal reserve bank will have the note of the member bank and the security in the shape of bonds only when the note is for 15 days; that is to say, if a member bank gives only its note with a bond as security the note can run only 15 days, and if the member bank gives a note from a customer indorsed by itself, that note not being what is termed a "commercial note," it must also give additional security, and these bonds may be the additional security. In that case the Federal reserve bank would have the note of the customer of the member bank which the member bank took, it would have the indorsement of the member bank on this note, and it would have the bond as security in addition.

Mr. President, that in no way will involve the strength of the Federal reserve bank. It can not possibly lessen the fluidity of their issue. I feel that it is wise and eminently proper if a member bank has some of these bonds and wishes at some time to put some security back of its notes, if merely its notes for 15 days, these bonds will be good. If it is the note of a customer indorsed by a member bank to which additional collateral must be added, then certainly these bonds would be good.

Mr. President, we must always keep in mind the fact that the Federal reserve banks reserve 40 per cent in gold for every dollar of Federal reserve notes that pass out from them, and that can not be loaned; it can not be borrowed by member banks. Again, they keep 35 per cent in gold or lawful money against their deposits. That is not to be loaned; that can not be borrowed by member banks.

I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma to strike out the provision that would allow the Federal reserve banks to invest in these bonds any of their funds available for business. Of course, at no time could they invest in these bonds their 40 per cent gold reserve, which is held against the Federal reserve notes, nor could they invest in Government bonds or these bonds any of their 35 per cent gold and lawful money which must be held as a reserve against deposits. I am opposed to their investing in these bonds any of their surplus funds which are available for loan purposes, available for Federal reserve bank business proper, just as I am opposed to their investing any of such funds now in Government bonds. I do not think it wise that any of the funds upon which business is to be done by the Federal reserve banks shall be invested in bonds at this time. I think those funds ought to be maintained for the conduct of the commercial business or general business of the Federal reserve banks.

The provision in the original bill allowing the investment in Government bonds was placed there upon the theory that business might be dull; that the Federal reserve banks might have an accumulation of reserves, of their own money, not called for and needing some mode of investment, and Government bonds were designated as the class of investment which they could make. I think it would be very unwise for the Federal reserve banks to-day so to invest and thereby lessen their $600,000,000 of available gold and lawful money not covered by their reserves and Federal reserve notes and their reserve for their deposits or to use it where it would cease to be fluid and ready for general business.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's position is that he only wants the Federal reserve banks to deal through commercial transactions for the purpose of relieving the market.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and I see no objection whatever to classing these bonds as Government bonds, as a security for a transaction in the Federal reserve banks. I think that advisable. I think they are as good a security as could be had. I think a bank which offers these bonds at their market value back of a discounted note of one of its customers for 90 days is giving a very liquid security; and if the note is only for 15 days—the note of the bank itself—then they certainly are a good security. I feel no fear of in any way adversely affecting the Federal reserve banks by such a transaction.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] is adopted we might as well defeat the bill and not pass it at all. I agree with the position taken by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The Government of the United States is not only morally bound to protect the bonds which are to be issued by this corporation, but, in my opinion, if any administration undertook to repudiate such bonds in anyway the American people would never stand for it. The bonds to be issued by this corporation will be just as good as any bonds that have ever been issued by the Government of the United States, with the single exception of some of the bonds that have been issued with special privileges—circulating privileges, for instance—but the bonds themselves are in reality obligations of the Government of the United States.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. And so far as the Federal reserve banks are concerned, Mr. President, they are not going to fail so long as the Government of the United States has one dollar of credit in the world.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is also true.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not care whether or not those banks have the 40 per cent reserve gold required by the law to-day, they are going to do business just as long as business is done by the citizens of this Republic.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to cordially acquiesce in the doctrine that the Federal reserve banks never will be permitted to fail by the Government of the United States so long as it has the taxing power and there is any property inside our limits.

Mr. SMOOT. So long, Mr. President, as the Government of the United States has a dollar of credit anywhere in the world I am not fearful that this legislation is going to interfere with the stability of the Federal reserve banks. I am not afraid to say now that if this war continues a year or two longer we shall not have 40 per cent gold reserve for the Federal reserve notes that may be issued. I expect the Federal reserve act to be amended in that respect; I expect that act to be so amended that there may be a greater issue than $2,500,000,000 at one time if we are in the war another year.

I am not afraid of the word "inflation" under conditions existing to-day. So far as I am concerned, I like the word inflation better than expansion, as seems to be agreed upon by the officials of the Treasury Department.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah, Does he not believe that in the conditions we have now surrounding us, whether it is called expansion or inflation, it is really necessary to expand our credits to some extent—to expand or to inflate our currency?

Mr. SMOOT. It is absolutely necessary, Mr. President, as I have said so many times during the discussion of this bill. We have got to do it whether we like it or not.

This question arose before the committee when Mr. Warburg was testifying, and I desire to read a part of the testimony, as follows:

> Senator SMOOT. Let me cite a case to you of what I think is going to happen, after the organization of this corporation with a capital of $500,000,000. There is authorized an issue not to exceed eight times the amount of capital stock of that corporation, which is $4,000,000,000. Then you issue a billion dollars of notes and obligations of this corporation. Now, they go onto the market, and we will say that half of those go into the hands of the investing public and the other half goes into the banks.
> Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.
> Senator SMOOT. Now, when the banks take $500,000,000 of those bonds they no doubt will go to the Federal bank and get currency on that $500,000,000.
> Mr. WARBURG. They might not get currency. They might want credit.
> Senator SMOOT. Suppose they do get it.
> Mr. WARBURG. Yes.
> Senator SMOOT. Suppose they do get it; then, when issued, there is that much inflation of the currency.
> Mr. WARBURG. Expansion.
> Senator SMOOT. Well, what is the difference? It is inflation. Now, I do not see why the Secretary of the Treasury wants to shy at the word "inflation." Everybody knows that we are going to have it. Why not say so?

Mr. President, those are the facts of the case as they really exist to-day. There is not a bank or a business man in the United States but knows that it is coming. I am aware that our currency is not inflated to-day. We have only issued on the gold reserve. We have one and a quarter billion dollars of currency. I am now speaking of the Federal reserve banks. Under the law they have the privilege of issuing another billion and a quarter of dollars and with the gold reserve that we have we could issue another $500,000,000; or, in other words, to-day with the gold reserve that we have, even under the provisions of the present law, we could issue additional currency to the amount of $2,000,000,000. Mr. President, we all know that $2,000,000,000 is not going to be sufficient to meet the financial needs, taking into consideration all that we may collect by direct taxation. We have got to have more money.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am interested in what the Senator says. Does the Senator think that the amount of the Government's expenditures bears any relation to the amount of currency in circulation?

Mr. SMOOT. It will bear a relation, Mr. President, just as soon as we reach the limit of the issue of currency.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, this year we are going to spend three times all the currency there is in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, Mr. President, and as we increase our expenditures next year and expand credits more and more we will have to increase the currency issue. We will have to get it somewhere; we only have $3,000,000,000 of gold in the United States—not in the banks but in all the United States. There are only $12,000,000,000 of gold in all the world, and we have control of one-fourth of it. That amount will not be sufficient to carry on the business of this country with our Government monopolizing the money market. It is true that the business of the country to the extent of 90 or 95 per cent is done upon credit, but the credit and business of this country has expanded so that there must be additional credits, and that only can be done in the manner I have already suggested.

Now, if we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, that will prevent the Federal reserve banks rediscounting the paper of business institutions that may have these bonds back of it as security. There is nothing to be gained by that, Mr. President, but everything to be lost.

The Senator from New Hampshire the other day thought that the corporation about to be created ought only to have $500,000,000 of capital, and that there should be no authorization for the issuance of $4,000,000 of bonds, and he thought that if they needed more than the $500,000,000 Congress then could increase the amount, but that the corporation should use it all as capital. Why, Mr. President, if we undertook to pass a bill at this time giving the war finance corporation only $500,000,000 the business interests of the Nation would simply say, "This will not relieve the situation; this will be used up before the year is over." Everyone knows that this corporation will have to make advances, as provided in paragraphs (b) and (c) and (d) of section 6, to the extent of more than $500,000,000. If we leave out of consideration all of the business concerns of this country that require money daily for carrying on of their business, bar the question of the expansion of trade that is absolutely necessary, and only consider the one question of the bonded indebtedness and obligations of corporations that fall due this coming year the $500,000,000 would not be enough to cover them.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very much interested in the argument of the Senator from Utah, and I am very glad that he has made his valuable contribution to the discussion, because I know that it will be read with a great deal of interest by the business people of the country. The other day I suggested that it made but very little difference whether the Government issued its bonds or whether the Federal reserve banks issued notes the same as currency. I can not distinguish any difference between the two. In either case the obligation is an obligation of the Government, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Morally it is an obligation of the Government, and I will say further that there will be no time in the history of the country when the Government of the United States will not meet the obligation.

Mr. GRONNA. And in the final analysis will it not result in this: The only capital of this corporation will be the amount of money deposited with it by the Government of the United States, namely, $500,000,000, will it not?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the only capital; yes.

Mr. GRONNA. We will say now that this corporation uses every dollar of the $500,000,000, and it will only get in securities $625,000,000, which will then be all the assets the corporation will have. Now, in order to get more the corporation will be authorized to issue eight times the amount of its capital stock; in other words, it will have to have a reserve of 12½ per cent; but whether that is issued in bonds of the United States—and I think it is confusing to use the word "notes"—we ought to use the word "bonds," because that is exactly what they will be; they will be bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what we have done.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that is exactly what the committee has already done. As it was originally written it read "notes or obligations."

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. We have stricken out the words "notes" and "obligations" and inserted "bonds."

Mr. GRONNA. I think that is what it ought to be.

Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, what I want to call attention to is this: I have listened to many Senators here who have used the argument that it would weaken the Federal reserve banks to take this function over. Now, what is the difference whether we allow the corporation to issue these bonds, which morally the Government of the United States must pay in any event, or whether we authorize the Federal reserve banks of the country, by the circumlocation of taking the Government bonds and upon the securities given by this corporation allow the Federal reserve bank to issue its notes? In my judgment there is no difference.

Mr. SMOOT. I am very glad, Mr. President, that the Senator has made the statement he has.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to know if the Senator from Utah agrees with me in that argument.

Mr. SMOOT. I have already stated my position, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know that it is necessary to take any more of the time of the Senate in discussing the pending amendment; but I do want to impress upon the Senate——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I did not understand the Senator from Utah to say that he agreed that it would accomplish the same purpose if the Federal reserve bank were authorized to issue enough notes to take the place of these four billions of bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the argument of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. SMOOT. No; this is what the Senator from Utah said and what I understood the Senator from North Dakota to mean: That as far as the security of the bonds issued by the corporation is concerned, they are as good as Government bonds, because the Government is morally obligated in either case.

Mr. SIMMONS. So far as it affects the obligation of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as the obligation of the Government is concerned.

Mr. President, I simply want to impress upon the Senate that if the pending amendment is adopted we might just as well, in my opinion, defeat the bill, as this is the very heart of the measure, and I sincerely trust that it will not be agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in its relation to the need for credits in financing the Government needs and of maturing bonds and of war industries, the relief of which is contemplated by the bill before the Senate—War Finance Corporation—I merely wish to call attention to the banking power of the banks of the United States, which will be found on page 109 of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. He says:

> As illustrating the marvelous growth in banking subsequent to the organization of the Federal reserve banks, it will be of interest to note that since June, 1914, the estimated banking power of the United States has increased from $24,340,000,000 to $34,473,100,000 in June, 1917—a gain of $10,133,100,000, or over 41 per cent, in three years.

Now, I favor giving the power sought for in this bill where needed to assist our war industries and business people. I favor these bonds, either as Government bonds or as the corporation's bonds. I would prefer to have them Government bonds, because I agree with the Senator from North Carolina, chairman of the Finance Committee, that these bonds are a moral obligation of the United States; and since there may be 1 per cent market difference between a moral obligation and a legal obligation of the Government, and that 1 per cent as compared to 4 per cent is a 25 per cent increase, I would prefer to have them Government bonds simply and plainly, because I do not discriminate between a moral responsibility and a legal responsibility. That is the reason why I contemplated offering a proposal of 4 per cent, which would be a fair rate upon the legal obligation of the Government; but I do not favor imposing a limitation of 4 per cent upon these proposed bonds as the corporation's bonds, because they will not go at 4 per cent; and there ought to be no limitation upon it if it is going to be merely a corporation bond. That bond will have to seek the market price, whatever it is, and pay 4½ or 5 per cent or whatever may be found necessary, even if it may disturb deposits in the savings banks, which I should exceedingly deprecate and which I had hoped to avoid.

Mr. SMOOT. Our liberty bonds did not have to pay that much.

Mr. OWEN. Our liberty bond, though, has behind it the patriotism and the taxing power of the Government of the United States; and everybody knows that if these gentlemen who have the great property of the country do not take the liberty bond they will find the alternative of a tax receipt in place of a Government bond; they are obliged to support these bond issues of the Government of the United States to carry on this war or pay the money over without a bond in the form of taxes to carry on this war. The Government is compelled to offer them a bond or a tax receipt, and they will prefer the bond unless their brains have ceased to function.

I wish to put into the RECORD this observation:

When the Government of the United States raises a thousand million dollars by taxes, or raises a thousand million dollars by floating a loan, these checks come in from the Atlantic to the Pacific in payment of the bond or in payment of the tax, and flow into the Treasury of the United States. Immediately the money flows right out of the Treasury again, just as fast as the transactions of the Government make it possible; and these credits from a million people flow out of the Treasury back and are distributed among many other million people, and the credits of the country, as far as their volume is concerned, are not impaired at all.

Mr. SMOOT. But the distribution is not uniform as to localities.

Mr. OWEN. There is some difference in the matter of localities; for where these taxes are drawn from the Pacific coast and from the Rocky Mountain States and from the Western States, and are then poured out in contracts in the part of the country which has the great factories, and where these contracts necessarily are very largely placed and must be largely placed, it does abstract credits from one part of the country and expands the credits in another, where these war activities are being carried on. It takes credits from the South and West and places them in the North and East. I have thought that the administration was bound by sound policy to see to it that these contracts for war industries should be distributed with some degree of equity in those parts of the country from which these large credits are withdrawn. I will say that there is not any contract whatever in Texas; there are no contracts in Kansas or Nebraska; none of them in the Rocky Mountain States; none of them in my own State of Oklahoma. I make no complaint of it. I only call the attention of the country to an existing condition, which I had hoped and still hope the administration may adjust as far as possible.

Mr. President, when these bonds are issued they are, of course, an investment security. Whether or not it is an investment which is quickly exchanged into cash must depend upon the market. A Government bond certainly has a quick and stable market; and therefore we did permit the Federal reserve banks to buy Government bonds and to receive Government bonds as security against notes which are discounted by the Federal reserve banks. This bond, if it has a quick, good market, might possibly be classed with a Government bond. If it has not the same market, if it appears to be a fluctuating bond, going from 100 to start on down to 95, and then to 92, and then to 88, or some such figures, it would not have a stable, reliable market. I do not think it is liable to go down very far, probably not very much below the Government bonds, if it is understood that the moral obligation of the Government is behind it.

I would prefer to make it a legal obligation, because in that case it would certainly make a quick market, and if that were done the bonds would have the status of a quick stable security on the notes which will be offered to the Federal reserve banks just as any other Government bond. It could be bought by the Federal reserve banks, if it were a Government bond, just as any other Government bond; and that is within the terms of the amendment which I offered for the RECORD last evening as a substitute for the pending bill.

I agree with the Senator from Utah that the Government of the United States is so fully and completely behind the Federal reserve act that if anything should miscarry with the Federal reserve act the Government of the United States would stand behind it to its last credit. But what I think is really the case is that these resources of the banks of $34,000,000,000 are abundant to take care of all investment securities that have a right to be offered. The only reason for the passage of this act is that the Government, in making a sweeping demand for large loans, is exhausting the readily available credit which is required by companies to carry on these war industries, required by companies that have maturing bonds falling due and which they find difficulty in getting capital with which to renew. I keenly sympathize with that situation, and I desire to give them relief; and when we put the credit of the United States behind the relief sought, when we take five hundred millions of cash out of the Treasury to start on, we are giving a gigantic aid, whether administered by a central bank called "the War Finance Corporation" or administered by the reserve banks, as I propose and which I should greatly prefer.

I remind the Senate of what is I think perfectly well known—that when Mr. Warburg drew this bill last September it only provided for fifty millions of capital and four hundred millions, or eight times the capital, for this purpose. He thought, and those who were in sympathy with this idea of giving assistance thought, that four hundred and fifty millions would be enough. Well, now, we are giving five hundred millions in primary capital out of the Treasury in this bill. It has been expanded ten times since it was born. It has been growing rapidly. I think more rapidly than necessary, because all of the maturities of these bonds will not amount to over eight or nine hundred millions this year. Many of them can be financed out of their own funds. The Government is advancing 30 per cent on contracts ahead of deliveries. The member banks can handle nearly all others easily in my opinion, but the other needs I wish to cordially help.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion, it is not contemplated to issue any large amount of bonds at once. Even this capital is only to be drawn from the Treasury by a vote of two-thirds of the directors.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; but that means nothing, as men authorized to draw $500,000,000 to help others will promptly draw it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the power for strengthening confidence that is important. The chances are that there will not be a large amount issued at once.

Mr. OWEN. I think there is a psychology in that proposal; that by offering to do this matter in a very big way it will establish confidence; and I think that confidence being established, the only thing in the world which is necessary to safeguard this matter fully is merely to give time for the digestion of these changing credits as they pass into the Treasury and pass out again. When they pass out again, these credits are immediately available for new credits.

That being true, it only requires a little element of time; and what the Senator says has force, that it is not intended to use it very largely. I do not think it would really require to be used very largely, and therefore that if these funds were placed with the reserve banks as a war finance fund it would suffice and give confidence and not require a new gigantic central bank in Washington, with its obvious disadvantages. The point which was made by the Senator from New Hampshire was that when we depart from our system of using any other than a Government bond for the purpose of withdrawing gold from these banks it is really in conflict with the fundamental idea of the Federal Reserve System that these reserves in gold of the member banks should be understood to be sacred and not to be used for anything less than a positive Government obligation or for commercial bills of quick maturities where the payment will be assured, so that these reserves will always be available to protect the twenty-four thousand million dollars of deposits in these banks.

I merely make this comment for what it may be worth, in order to express my own judgment as to the conditions.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, this is a most valuable discussion that we are having in the Senate to-day. We can not, as Senators, discharge our duties to the country in war times without discussing the finances of the country. I am sounding the alarm here to-day against this assault on the Federal reserve system and against the further assaults that the Senator from Utah says are coming.

I had no apprehension before this discussion started that there would be a reduction of the gold reserve behind the Federal reserve notes in this country. The Senator from Utah says that he expects that there will be a proposition shortly to reduce the gold reserves that are behind the Federal reserve notes to 35 per cent and even lower. Now, that will surely come. I have already called the attention of the Senate to the fact that we established a sound Federal reserve system, based on sound banking principles, after years of study, after months of consideration in the Senate. We built it strong, and we intended it to be permanent. We did not assume that at the first flurry that came under war conditions we would hurry to amend it and make it less sound.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I want to say that so far is it true of the resources of the Federal reserve banks to lend money that those banks now, with their gold reserves, by lowering the reserve of the Federal reserve banks to the legal limit, as permitted by the terms of the Federal reserve act, could make further loans of about forty hundred million dollars.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is, the banks themselves?

Mr. OWEN. The Federal reserve banks could to the member banks, and therefore the member banks themselves could by rediscounting.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh! The Senator is speaking now of the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. OWEN. The Federal reserve banks, by lowering the amount of reserve against their loans, could expand loans to nearly $4,000,000,000—to be more exact, about $3,899,000,000—without asking the banks for additional gold, and they have $1,502,502,076, a substantial part of which could be used. (Rept. Comp. Cur. 1917, pp. 109, 120, 136, etc.)

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, that may be true.

Mr. OWEN. The reserve banks have $1,777,000,000 in gold and about $54,000,000 in lawful money, total $1,837,000,000, against which stands a gold charge at 35 per cent on deposits of $1,710,000,000, equal to a gold charge of $598,000,000, leaving $1,239,000,000 of gold, or its equivalent, which at the minimum rate allowed by law of 25 per cent would permit an issue of reserve notes of four times as much, or $4,956,000,000. Deducting reserve notes already issued—$1,057,000,000—would leave a net amount of $3,899,000,000 of reserve notes possible.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I hope that no such inflation as that will occur, either under the present law or under amendments to the law.

This matter of finance is not as difficult as Senators would have us think. The Government has gone into the market to borrow vast sums. It has swept the investment market bare, because it needed the money for war purposes. Now, we find the conditions of the money market disturbed because the Government has practically commandeered the funds that are available. We are disturbed at that, and well we may be, because banking conditions are out of gear; so the proposition is to have the Government come to the rescue. We would not ask the Government to come to the rescue of financiers unless we thought that necessary, and the first contribution we make is $500,000,000 of the money that has been borrowed from capitalists for the use of the Government. We contribute that to this great United States bank, and we are afraid that is not enough, and we are giving the bank authority to issue its bonds to eight times the amount of its capital, or $4,000,000,000. Then we are afraid that these bonds will not sell on the market. If they would sell on the market there would be no reason to give them any discount facilities with the Federal reserve banks, and it is for the sole purpose of giving the bonds a market that we attach this discounting privilege to them. Then Senators say that it will not do any harm to allow currency to be issued on these bonds, because they will meet with a ready sale; and yet it is for the very reason that they will not meet with a ready sale that we find it necessary to give them these discounting privileges with the Federal reserve banks.

I am not afraid of the soundness of the Federal reserve banks under the present conditions. The Government, we are told in a grandiloquent way, will not permit the Federal reserve banks to fail. Why, the credit of the Federal reserve banks to-day is away above the credit of the Government. Every obligation of the Federal reserve banks is at 100 cents on the dollar; it is at par, while the Government obligations, the liberty bonds, are at 96 or 97. Instead of the person leaning on the staff, the proposition is to have the staff lean on the person. The banks are sound to-day. I want to keep them so, and it is because I fear that this inroad, if once started, will undermine the credit of the Federal reserve banks that I offer this amendment.

The amount of money or currency that is circulating in a country bears no relation whatever to the needs of the Government. We have an enormous supply of currency now, quite as much currency as we had in 1896. There is no stringency so far as currency is concerned. Now, what happens when the Government wants to borrow more money? We do not get gold as the proceeds of the liberty bonds; we do not get greenbacks; we do not get paper money; we do not get any cash; we get checks. Now, assume a man wants to purchase $100,000 of liberty bonds to help the Government. He goes to his bank; he puts up his note for $100,000; the bank gives him credit on the books for $100,000 as a transfer and puts his note on the other side of the ledger. They have then a liability in the shape of a deposit of $100,000 on one part of the ledger, and they have the man's note in the shape of a resource on the other side of the ledger, and there is no more money in the country; the bank has merely given its credit to the man, and the man has turned that credit over to the Government. The Government, for instance, has no relation whatever to the amount of currency that is available; but the amount of currency that is launched by the Federal reserve bank bears a very distinct and vital relation to the assets of the Federal reserve bank and to the amount of gold it has as a reserve. The proposition made here deliberately on the floor of the Senate to begin to lower the gold reserve back of our Federal reserve notes merely points to the path of danger we are pursuing by making a start under this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one word. I will say that what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has already said, if it were peace times I would most heartily approve of. I want nothing to come to interfere with the stability of every note issue of the Federal banks. I recognize the interest that the Senator has in them, and I have the same interest he has.

But, Mr. President, we are passing legislation every day that no Senator would ever think of voting for or no one ever would dare to request in ordinary peace times. We are in war, Mr. President, and it is this kind of legislation that requires a war to secure its passage.

It is for that reason that I made the suggestion I did, and the Senator will remember that I qualified it by saying if we are in war for another year or two then what I stated would happen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. PENROSE's name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is unavoidably absent. He has a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. If the Senator from Pennsylvania were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. He is absent, and I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. It having been announced that if he were present he would vote "nay," as I desire to vote that way, too, I feel at liberty vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay." I therefore feel at liberty to vote and do vote "nay."

Mr. KNOX. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to my colleague [Mr. PENROSE] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING. May I ask if the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 5, nays 61, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. HOLLIS was rejected.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I did not vote on the last item. If I had voted, I should have voted "yea." The reason why I did not vote was because I knew that the vote would be overwhelmingly in favor of the committee report, because when this matter was being debated in the Senate there were only a very few Senators on the floor. Senators are called away by their committee meetings and other obligations and in reality the discussion is not heard on the floor. These matters are very largely controlled in committee, so that in reality the discussion on the floor is very difficult indeed, and, in nearly all cases, quite futile. I knew, therefore, what was going to happen and I simply withheld my vote in order to make this comment.

Now, Mr. President, I have an amendment which I offer which will take but two or three moments. On page 11, line 5, after the words "Secretary of the Treasury," I move to insert as a new sentence the following words:

Such bonds shall be issued in terms of foreign money and sold to American importers at par to the extent necessary to cover their importations from and credit transfers to countries whose currency is at a premium.

I understand the Secretary of the Treasury intends in selling liberty bonds to have some of these bonds issued in the terms of foreign money. In that way these corporation bonds can be taken and transferred to a foreign country as a basis of credit there, and in that way our importers and those concerned in transacting business can avoid the present high premium on foreign money.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator please read the first part of his amendment again?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator read the amendment again.

Mr. OWEN (reading)—

Such bonds shall be issued in terms of foreign money and sold to American importers at par to the extent necessary to cover their importations from and credit transfers to countries whose currency is at a premium.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why does the Senator use the word "shall"?

Mr. OWEN. It is "shall" to the extent that they can be used by importers to avoid the present high premium.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am in entire sympathy with the purpose of the Senator. I think it is a very good purpose. I wish to look more closely at the amendment, however.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator will have abundant opportunity. I prefer that he should look at it because it is very simple and very easily understood.

Mr. SIMMONS. That, of course, gives the discretion to the Treasury Department when these applications are made. I suggest to the Senator that he change the word "shall" to "may."

Mr. OWEN. I will change it to read "may be issued in terms of foreign money."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. On page 11, lines 13 and 14, after the words "the Federal Reserve Board may approve," I move to insert the words—at not less than 1 per cent in excess of the interest rate fixed upon commercial paper by the Federal Reserve Board in this district.

That would give the Government a margin of 1 per cent in making these advances so that the fund would have what might be called an insurance fund in protecting it against the possibility of some of these securities proving to be unsound in any way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have left that matter in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, and I for one think it would be better to leave it there now.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Oklahoma will notice in the paragraph referring to the savings banks we there provide for one-half of 1 per cent. As originally drawn it was not less than 1 per cent. The committee changed it to one-half.

Mr. OWEN. That was done because of the character of the savings banks.

Mr. SIMMONS. This does not apply to savings banks.

Mr. OWEN. It does not apply to savings banks.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to state to the Senator the reason why it was not put in. We thought there ought to be an expression in relation to the amount charged, but that the discretion ought to be left entirely with the Federal Reserve Board as to the amount of interest and general business. There may be times when one-half of 1 per cent or three-fourths of 1 per cent would be sufficient, and there may be of course times when it would be 1½ per cent. The Senator's amendment, however, would not affect that; but if the Senator's amendment is adopted, no matter what condition may arise or what the situation of the money market may be, they would be compelled to charge at least 1 per cent.

Mr. OWEN. Will the chairman of the committee agree to one-half of 1 per cent, that the same rate fixed for the savings banks should apply to these lines of business?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would very much prefer to have the Senate vote upon the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, it is very evident that the Senate intends to pass the bill in its present form. If I felt that Senators were interested in the financial affairs of the Government, I should offer some other amendments. For example, I would limit the rate of the bonds to be issued by the central banks to 5 per cent. It is evident that they will come in direct competition with the Government bonds. It is evident that under the terms of the bill the five directors of the bank may issue them at any rate that they care to fix. I think we ought to limit it. I feel that the bond provision of the bill ought to be stricken from the bill altogether. The bonds issued in this way will surely plague the flotation of the liberty loan bonds. They will be in direct competition with the Government. Many people will not buy liberty loan bonds because they know that these bonds will shortly be for sale at a higher rate. They must be for sale at a higher rate in order to sell at all, because while the question is discussed here as to whether these bonds will be the moral obligation of the Government, they certainly are not the direct obligation of the Government, and no investor will pay as much for them as he would pay for the bonds of the Government. If the Government is coming to the relief of distressed capitalists and financiers, as it is under the bill, the best way for the Government to do so is to borrow the money or get it in taxation and advance the money to the capitalists. That is very much the better way, instead of going through this rigmarole of organizing a central bank, giving them authority to issue bonds, and if the bonds are not saleable allowing the banks to put them up as security for rediscount to the Federal reserve bank. I would very much prefer it that way.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has presented to the Senate an amendment. I do not know whether he intends to present it for the consideration of the Senate to come to a vote.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I presented the amendment in the form of a substitute, but I know the futility of discussing it to empty benches and then having the Senate come in and sustain the committee. There are only about a dozen Senators now present. For that reason, although chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, I am really precluded from discussing it, because I have no audience. The arguments which I would make would not reach the ears of the Senate. The only way in which the Senate may be reached is through its parliamentary eyes and ears comprised of its committees, is to have measures submitted to its committee for examination, and have the committee report upon the bill. Knowing that perfectly well—as everybody knows, familiar with Senate procedure—and the Committee on Banking and Currency having, of course, had no opportunity whatever of passing upon this war finance corporation bill, establishing this great bank and amending the reserve act, that committee has not been able to make its suggestions to the Senate as a committee, and realizing, as I keenly do, the futility of discussing it when the Senate can not or does not hear it, under the circumstances I do not feel inclined to take the time of the Senate to discuss it at all, except casually, in trying to make some minor amendments.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then I will explain the amendment of the Senator in a word, because the Senator's plan would be infinitely better than the one the Senate is about to adopt. Under the Senator's plan the Government in extending this relief to capitalists and financiers would extend it through the Federal Reserve System. It would merely make the Federal reserve bank the Government fiscal agent for the purpose of advancing these sums to those who wanted to procure them through their member banks. That is, a man who wanted money for a proper purpose would go to his member bank as he goes now to his regular banking house. That bank would look into the proposition, and, if it thought he ought to have the money, it would loan it to him. Then the member bank could go to the Federal reserve bank in the district and turn the obligation of the borrower, with the indorsement of the member bank, over to the Federal reserve bank, and out of the war fund placed by the Treasury at the disposal of the Federal reserve bank for that purpose the loan would be made. It would not weaken the Federal Reserve System, because there would be no obligation of the Federal reserve bank to pay the money back to the Government. The Federal reserve bank, through the machinery already in existence, through its agents and through the member bank, would loan the Government money on securities that the member bank and the Federal reserve bank thought were sound. That is in place of having five directors of a central bank we would have the directors of each Federal reserve bank and the directors of the member banks. There is no infirmity in that system. If it were adopted we would avail ourselves of the existing machinery. That is all paid for by the Federal reserve bank. The Federal reserve banks are a paying institution now. They are earning dividends for the Government, and they could well afford to do this. I believe they would be glad to do it rather than to have their funds in competition with the funds of this great central bank. I think that could be done. I have heard no objection to it.

The plan was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury the other day, and he merely said that he preferred this way, because he had had a chance to consider it, and the other plan had not been brought to his attention so that he cared to give an opinion upon it.

I think I ought to say at this time, before the debate closes on the bill, that my reference day before yesterday to a distinguished gentleman who appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee was not to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury was perfectly frank. He said that he was in charge of the Government financing for the war, that he took the responsibility of wanting this measure, and if this measure was not given to him, but if some other measure were given, he did not want to take the responsibility for it, but he would go ahead and do the best he could. His attitude was perfectly fair. He did not say the bill should not be discussed. That suggestion came from another source.

Now, there are many omissions in this bill. It has not been worked over carefully. The microscope should have been put on it. For instance, there is not authority in the bill for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to get out the bonds that will be issued under it. That can not be done without an authorization, because this is a private corporation, although the funds are contributed to the capital of the corporation. The American Bank Note Co., that will probably be represented on this corporation, will get the contract for printing and engraving these bonds and securities. It can not be done by the Government unless we authorize it. There is no provision in the bill whatever for examining or auditing this bank. These five gentlemen take over the $500,000,000, they sell the $4,000,000,000 of bonds, they handle the money as they please, merely making a report under the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to Congress once a quarter. There is no requirement that the five directors who are to handle this four billion of money should give a bond to the Government. They are merely appointed and confirmed by the Senate. They handle this money exactly as they please. They loan it at such rates as they please. They issue bonds at such rates as they please. They give no bond whatever for the performance of their duty. They need not even be citizens of the United States. We will not permit a man to be a director of a national bank without being a citizen of the United States. There is no restriction on the amount of loan that can be made to any one person or corporation whatever. They can loan all the capital of the bank and all its resources to one corporation or to one person if they see fit. The bonds are sold to the public. They are claimed to be as good as United States bonds, and the assets to secure the bonds are in the absolute possession and control of unbonded officials. There is no prohibition upon receiving commissions or fees as the result of any loans that they may make.

I venture to hazard a guess that a great bank of that kind can not be safely put into business under the provisions that are contained in the 12 pages of the act devoted to that purpose.

But, as the Senator from Oklahoma has said, the bill as it comes before the Senate has had the sanction of the committee that has been intrusted with it, and it is useless to offer amendments that are not satisfactory to the committee. I, therefore, refrain from doing so. I shall, however, when the bill gets into the Senate, reserve the amendment with reference to the requirement that the directors of the corporation shall devote their entire time to the business of the corporation and that they shall before taking office cease their connection with any other financial institution.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I share the opinion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], but I have not opposed any of the provisions of this bill. I have, however, given it some attention. I believe, as the Senator from New Hampshire has stated, that in the interest of economy and good administration it would have been better to have done this work through the Federal reserve banks, but I shall not oppose the final passage of the bill.

I desire to remind the Senate, however, that the so-called corporation about to be created is nothing more nor less than a Government bank. I want to remind the Senate and the country of the fact that this legislation is communistic; that it is socialistic. It is a measure which would make Carl Marx and other great socialists turn in their graves. We are taking four hundred or five hundred million dollars of money from the Treasury of the United States to finance this corporation. It will be administered by officials of the Government. We are further authorizing this so-called corporation—which is nothing more nor less than the Government itself—to expand its operations, to issue bonds to the extent of eight times the amount of the capital stock so called.

In a few days there will be before this body—I think it will be here, for I understand it will be passed by the other body—a bill providing that the Government of the United States shall appropriate some $10,000,000 out of the Treasury to be invested in farm securities to help the farmers of the country procure feed and seeds. I am quite sure when that measure comes to this body many of the Senators who have so eloquently spoken in favor of this bill will construe it as being fraught with the gravest danger and characterize it as being socialistic, but Mr. President, that is not their contention when we take four thousand five hundred million dollars of the people's money to assist corporations. There is not a Senator here who will say that the pending measure is for any other purpose than to assist corporations. I find no fault with that; I believe that in this hour of peril it is our duty to assist public-utility corporations, banking corporations, and others, but I simply want to remind the Senate of the fact that they will soon have the opportunity of voting on another measure, which will be for the purpose of assisting individual citizens of the United States and not merely corporations which have no souls.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Hollis	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smith, Mich.
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smoot
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Sterling
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Stone
Fernald	Kellogg	Page	Sutherland
Fletcher	Kendrick	Phelan	Thomas
France	Kenyon	Pittman	Tillman
Frelinghuysen	King	Reed	Trammell
Gallinger	Kirby	Saulsbury	Underwood
Gerry	Knox	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Gore	Lewis	Sheppard	Walsh
Gronna	Lodge	Sherman	Warren
Hale	McCumber	Shields	Watson
Harding	McKellar	Simmons	Wolcott
Henderson	McNary	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to move an amendment to section 7 to this effect:

> The members of the capital issues committee shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

We have amended the bill so as to provide that the board of the corporation which is to manage these great funds shall be confirmed by the Senate, but the power to restrict all credits is very much more important than the power to grant limited credit through this corporation. I think that the Senate of the United States ought to have a voice in saying who this committee shall be, and that they ought to have the opportunity of advising and consenting to its membership.

The parliamentary status of this matter, as I understand, is that section 7 went over subject to amendment to-day, if we might think wise to offer amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator if his amendment is intended to include the appointment on this committee of the Federal Reserve Board members?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have already been appointed by the President.

Mr. OWEN. But the "capital issues committee" under this act will be a legal body established by Congress with entirely different functions, and the members of that new legal body should be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Such members of the Federal Reserve Board as will be designated for service upon this committee have already been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Not for a position on the "capital issues committee," which is a new legal entity.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I quite sympathize with the purpose of the Senator from Oklahoma, in so far as it relates to the members of the committee who have not previously been appointed by the President.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Oklahoma, would they not automatically cease to be members of the Federal Reserve Board if they were nominated and confirmed for a new office?

Mr. OWEN. I think they ought to be so nominated and confirmed, because the members of the Federal Reserve Board have a tremendous task on their hands now. They have charge of 8,000 member banks and of 12 great Federal reserve banks. I think that they ought, if they become members of the "capital issues committee," to give their entire time to this new work. It will be of very great importance—of commanding importance.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. My attention was diverted for a moment, and I desire to ask, Does the amendment which the Senator from Oklahoma has offered provide that the President shall appoint the members of the committee?

Mr. OWEN. That was the amendment that I intended to offer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator offered the amendment?

Mr. OWEN. I have not yet offered it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that at present the Chair does not think his amendment would be in order. The bill has not yet been reported to the Senate. The amendment will be in order when the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Permit me to call the attention of the Chair to the agreement which was made last night that section 7 if it went over until to-day would be subject to further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the bill got into the Senate, the Chair understands.

Mr. OWEN. Then, I shall reserve the right to offer the amendment when the bill arrives in the Senate to strike out the words "of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board" and to insert "the members of the capital issues committee shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." If that fails, then I shall offer an amendment to insert "the members of the capital issues committee shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, lest I might not be present when this matter is considered, when the bill arrives in the Senate I want to say that I think the effort I made to have this provision go over until to-day was fully justified, in view of the amendment which the Senator from Oklahoma proposes to offer. I think it is important that the President shall appoint these men, and I shall take great pleasure in voting for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma when it is presented to the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether or not in his amendment he desires to strike out the provision which reads:

There shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board—

Not by the President, but—by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital issues committee—

Three members of which shall be members of that board?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the motion which I intend to make will be to insert words to the effect that there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a capital issues committee to consist of five members.

Mr. McCUMBER. Without reference whence they are to be selected?

Mr. OWEN. Without reference whence they come.

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment does not require three of them to be selected from the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. OWEN. No. It would leave the President with discretion to choose them as he liked.

Mr. McCUMBER. That will kill the whole purpose of the committee amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma would destroy the entire purpose of the committee amendment and what they thought it very important to bring about.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Massachusetts is laboring under a misapprehension. The Senator from Oklahoma, I think, does not offer the amendment now, because the Chair holds that it is not in order. The Senator said he would offer the amendment when the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and is subject to amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there is one verbal correction that I think the chairman of the committee will accept. On page 10, line 17, I move to strike out the word "may" and insert the word "to." The language immediately preceding is descriptive of the bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, my attention was diverted, and I will ask him to restate his amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. In line 17, on page 10, I move to strike out the word "may" and insert the word "to." The language is descriptive of the bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. That amendment is all right. I talked with the Senator about it the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it is a gratification to me to be able to offer an amendment to this bill which I think will not be objected to by any Senator. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to page 16, line 10, where the word "corporation" has not been changed, as it has been throughout the entire bill, by spelling it with a capital C and putting it in italics. The Senator will observe that is the only place where that has not been done.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it should be amended in that particular.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the word "corporation," on page 16, line 10, be spelled with a capital C and be printed in italics, as it is throughout the remainder of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there is one other verbal change which should be made on page 2, line 7, to correct what appears to be a grammatical mistake. At that place the word "are" should be changed to "is" The subject of that verb is the Secretary of the Treasury, and, while he is performing many functions, he is one person. It should read:

The Secretary of the Treasury, together with four additional persons (who shall be the directors first appointed as hereinafter provided), is hereby created—

And so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is correct, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 15, after the word "company," it is proposed to insert "fire or life insurance companies."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that amendment is inserted in a different place than where it was inserted yesterday.

Mr. CALDER. No; I propose to insert it a second time, so as to make the bill conform with the similar amendment adopted last evening.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it necessary that it be inserted twice?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of those amendments on which a separate vote has been reserved in the Senate.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have reserved two amendments, one at the top of page 4 and the other at the bottom of page 4 and the top of page 5.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is not necessary again to announce the reservations, is it? I have already reserved the right to offer an amendment, and I do not think that I need to do so again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If an amendment has been reserved, that is all that is necessary. The question is on concurring in those amendments upon which a separate vote has not been reserved.

The amendments not reserved were concurred in.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire now to say the few words that I intended to say a few moments ago, but which I deferred until the bill reached the Senate, with reference to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The purpose of the committee was to put the regulation of new capital issues in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board; that was the main object of the amendment, and I think the object was a wise one. I believe that from every standpoint the Federal Reserve Board is much better fitted to deal with that subject. In the first place, they have been dealing with it already through a voluntary committee, and, in the second place, the Federal Reserve Board has the confidence of the country and is well known. It would take a long time for the directors of the new corporation to acquire and make themselves masters of the information which the Federal Reserve Board now possesses. It seems to me that it would be most unfortunate to break down the main purpose of the amendment prepared by the committee which was designed to leave this heavy duty in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board and not have another new committee.

Then, Mr. President, as we provide that three members of the committee shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board, I think it ought to be left to them to select the two additional members who are to assist them with the work. The members of the Federal Reserve Board have been before the Senate, having been appointed by the President, and have received the confirmation of the Senate. If this function is to be placed in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, of course, to confirm them again for another office, it seems to me, would be out of the question and would raise all kinds of objections possibly which it would be well not to raise.

I hope, Mr. President, that the provision will be allowed to stand as it is. It was given great consideration by the committee, and I am firmly of the opinion that the wisest way to deal with the matter is to have for this important work an independent committee of this kind based on the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the amendment which I propose does not take from the Federal Reserve Board or any members of that board any power whatever. The President can nominate them if he thinks fit. This is avowedly an administration measure. It came here from the Treasury Department; it is unchanged so far as that feature is concerned; and if the President desires to nominate three members of the Federal Reserve Board to hold positions on the capital issues committee he will certainly be at liberty to do so.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The words as they now appear in the bill are not the words that were in the bill as it came from the Treasury Department.

Mr. OWEN. In what particular do they differ?

Mr. LODGE. Under the bill as it came to us from the Treasury Department the whole power was left in a board organized in the war finance corporation. We altered it entirely, and this provision as to the Federal Reserve Board is the work of the committee.

Mr. OWEN. That is all right. Then, the object of the committee will not be interfered with, because it is the desire of the committee evidently that the members of the Federal Reserve Board, who are in charge of this matter now shall continue in charge, and the President of the United States undoubtedly will be in harmonious relation with the Federal Reserve Board and will be able to nominate members of that board to the Senate, but I do not think the Senate ought to abdicate its high functions as a coordinate body. Here is a committee which will absolutely control the entire credits of the United States in all new enterprises; it will affect thousands of millions of dollars, and why should the Senate of the United States abdicate its functions and transfer this gigantic power to a subordinate bureau of the Treasury, the Federal Reserve Board, and have no voice whatever as to the personnel charged with carrying this work out, for it will be these individuals at last who will carry out the law. The Senate ought to have a voice in the matter, at least to the extent of saying that those individuals are satisfactory to the Senate unless the Senate desires to abdicate its powers and relieve itself of all responsibility. I do not think the plan proposed by the committee is a prudent policy. I think the Senate ought to be satisfied with regard to who shall be on this committee. There never was a committee given so great power in the history of this Government; there has never been established a committee that has or ever has had anything like the power being now given to this committee; but if the Senate chooses to abdicate its right of a voice in the choice of the personnel to carry the law out, I can not help it; I must be content with expressing my opinion as a Member of this body, and that duty I have performed as I have felt obliged to do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when the bill was submitted to the committee it gave the power of appointing the members of this committee to the corporation itself. I presume there is nothing in the bill that has been discussed more thoroughly by the committee than this particular item. What the Senator from Oklahoma says is true, that this committee will have almost untold power. It will be able to make or be able to break almost any institution in this country; that is, it could have done so under the original provision, although section 7 now has been greatly modified, but not modified so that this committee will not still have great power that it may exercise against a person or for a person, against a corporation or for a corporation. Therefore, Mr. President, the committee thought that the Federal Reserve Board, having the confidence of the people of the United States, having been nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and having knowledge of the value of securities and of the situation generally from a financial point of view, should have the right to appoint this committee.

Again, Mr. President, I do not believe that there ought to be any political influence whatever in the appointment of this committee. It may be said that the President would not let such considerations interfere, but who knows what pressure will be brought to bear upon him by certain interests or certain politicians to appoint certain men on this committee. The Federal Reserve Board, if the responsibility is placed upon them, will appoint men in whom they have confidence, and men they know are especially qualified. Three members of that board are to be members of the capital issues committee, and the other two members of that committee outside of the Federal Reserve Board are to be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. President, I believe that the information in the possession of the Federal Reserve Board will be of great value in selecting the members of this committee. The Committee on Finance was so careful that they provided that a majority of the capital issues committee must be members of the Federal Reserve Board, because they wanted the people of the country to understand that the Federal Reserve Board was virtually responsible for the capital issues committee, and that they themselves would appoint men in connection with the three members of the Federal Reserve Board who would give thorough consideration to all the business interests of this country that needed assistance. I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will not agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. At least as far as the two members of this board who are not members of the Federal Reserve Board are concerned, does not the Senator think that all the safeguards that can be thrown about their appointment ought to be thrown around it? Does he not think it would add to it if they must be confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think it would add anything, Mr. President. I think the man that would be appointed by the President of the United States would be confirmed by the Senate whether a politician or a business man.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator advocate that? Has he not always considered, I think in one of the amendments to this bill, that confirmation by the Senate is an additional safeguard? Why would it not be better in this case? Why should part of the committee be selected at large, without any power of Congress, or any branch of Congress, to pass upon it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that in this particular case there should be no semblance of a political appointment.

Mr. NORRIS. I fully agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. SMOOT. And I am quite sure, with the make-up of the Federal Reserve Board, and with the knowledge that they have of the financial conditions of the country, that they are not going to make a political appointment. We can not say that. I am afraid, if the matter is left to the President of the United States. He may not want to be influenced by political considerations; but the Senator from Nebraska knows the pressure that is brought to bear upon the President in making appointments, and the Senator from Nebraska knows that there are very few appointments made by the President that ever come to the Senate of the United States that the Senate refuses to confirm.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that the pressure upon the Federal Reserve Board would be less, or less effective, than upon the President?

Mr. SMOOT. I do; and not only that, the pressure would have to influence at least a majority of the board before it would be successful.

Mr. BORAH. That is according to where it comes from.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I believe that it would be very unwise.

I am informed by the Senator from Oklahoma that he has not yet offered his amendment; but what I have said with relation to it stands, as far as I am concerned, as if it had been offered.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment. I will read the beginning of section 7:

That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, there shall be appointed by—

At that point I move to strike out "the Federal Reserve Board" and what follows to the end of the sentence, and to insert:

by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a capital issues committee, to consist of five members, three of whom shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. KENYON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out of the amendment agreed to on yesterday, as section 7, the words:

The Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital issues committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board.

And to insert:

by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a capital issues committee, to consist of five members, three of whom shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the Senator from Oklahoma offered his amendment in the first place, I confess that I was laboring under a misapprehension as to its exact purpose. I have some doubt as to the amendment in the form in which it is presented now.

If the two additional members were to be appointed by the President, I could see great propriety in that; but it does not quite appeal to me that these three members of the Federal Reserve Board, who have already been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate and have been sworn into office, shall again go through the routine of appointment and confirmation.

So that I am a little in doubt as to the propriety of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, notwithstanding I suggested, when it was first offered, that I thought it ought to be agreed to. I shall reserve my vote until I give it careful thought, when it is voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I am informed that if he were present he would support the measure as it came from the committee. Therefore I feel justified in voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. Owing to his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I vote "nay." In explanation of my vote I will say that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I am paired, if present would vote the same way, and therefore I am at liberty to vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to inquire if the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). He has not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have a pair with that Senator and withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 35, as follows:

So Mr. OWEN's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I now ask for a separate vote on the amendment by the Committee of the Whole to be found on the top of page 4, section 5.

The amendment by the Committee of the Whole is to strike out the provision that the directors shall devote their entire time to the business of the corporation, except such part of their time, if any, as shall be devoted to other governmental business. The question, as I understand it, will come on agreeing to the committee amendment, so that those who believe that the directors of the corporation should devote their whole time to the corporation's business will vote "nay."

Mr. President, we have heard a great deal about the patriotism of the dollar-a-year men who have come to Washington and are contributing their whole time to the Government for a dollar a year. We have heard somewhat less about the young men who are drafted to serve on the firing line for $30 or $35 a month. They are required to give all their time to the job for which the Government has drafted them; and is it any hardship on one of these superfinanciers who are to manage this great central bank, receiving a salary of $12,000 annually, that he shall devote his entire time to the job that he is called to perform?

There is no need to argue the matter further. It was argued at considerable length when it was voted on in the Committee of the Whole; but I appeal to the Senate to insist that this part of the bill, which was brought here by the administration, and which for some reason was cut out by the committee, shall stay in the bill; and I ask them, on this question, to vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state, for the information of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the question before the Senate is upon concurring in the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, as amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, as a substitute for section 7.

Mr. HOLLIS. I had overlooked that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be disposed of before taking up the amendment referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The question is upon concurring in the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, as amended, by which a substitute was made for section 7.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, may I ask, if this substitute now is agreed to, whether it will preclude any further amendment being offered to section 7?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. STERLING. Then I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk, to section 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "United States," in the fourth line from the bottom of the print, it is proposed to insert "nor to the securities issued by or under the authority of any State, and payable by the State."

Mr. STERLING obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator where he proposes to insert that amendment?

Mr. STERLING. I am not able to designate now where the amendment would come in the substitute for section 7, as that was offered separately, and the only form in which I have the substitute is the typewritten form which was given out to Senators yesterday.

Mr. SIMMONS. It will have to go in somewhere.

Mr. STERLING. I will read the language which it will follow:

This section shall not be construed to apply to any securities issued by any railroad corporation, the property of which may be in the possession and control of the President of the United States.

Then, after these words, follows the amendment which I have just offered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator read his amendment again?

Mr. STERLING. I will ask the Secretary to state it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The SECRETARY. The amendment, as adopted, reads as follows:

This section shall not be construed to apply to any securities issued by any railroad corporation, the property of which may be in the possession and control of the President of the United States—

Then comes the amendment—

nor to the securities issued by or under the authority of any State, and payable by the State.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a word with reference to this amendment.

It occurs to me that this committee should not pass upon the securities of a State. By "the securities of a State," I mean the bonds issued under the authority of the State or by the State, and payable by the State. This, of course, would exclude municipal securities which I think should come under the provisions of the bill, and should be considered by the committee, and it should be determined whether or not they are necessary capital expenditures under the terms of the bill; but it seems to me, Mr. President, that it ought to be assumed in regard to State securities, State bonds, that they are necessary, else a State of the Union would not have authorized the issuance of such securities.

Mr. President, it may be urged, as it frequently is, that the committee never would exercise the power to disapprove any State bonds or securities; but I am able to refer, as an illustration, to what has occurred already.

The present advisory committee of the Federal Reserve Board has assumed the authority of passing upon State securities. We have, in South Dakota, a rural-credit law. It is analogous to the Federal rural-credit law. The law is framed along the same general lines, and provides for farm loans for the purpose of purchasing farm lands and for the purpose of improving and equipping farm lands. The Rural Credit Commission of South Dakota has made a great many loans and has issued a great many bonds in pursuance of the law of the State. It has granted applications for many more loans. There are many other applications yet to be passed upon by the rural credit commission of the State; but, anticipating that there might be objection on the part of the Federal Reserve Board, they sent to me a communication asking me to see that committee to see if subsequent issues of bonds will be approved of. I took the communication, together with the law, together with a questionnaire gotten out by the commission for the purpose of informing prospective borrowers as to the law, to the committee, and they took the matter very seriously. The question arose as to what the loans were to be made for and what was the basis of the bond issues. When informed that the loans were to be made largely for the purpose of equipping and improving farms and thereby adding to the production of food supplies they considered that that was quite a factor in the consideration of the question as to whether or not they should approve of the issuance of the bonds. I say they took the matter very seriously. They had it under advisement for a week, and finally I was informed that these bonds would be approved if issued by the State.

So, Mr. President, taking this case simply as an illustration, I think that the committee provided for in this bill should not pass upon the necessity of the issue of State bonds. I may say further that there is little danger now, under constitutional limitations in regard to the amount and the purposes for which State bonds may be issued, of an improvident or an unnecessary issue of such bonds. Therefore I think this amendment ought to prevail, and that this should be just the one class of securities, in addition to the railroad securities, upon which this committee should not be called upon to pass or assume authority to pass.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very much interested in the Senator's amendment and in what the Senator says. Yesterday I called attention to conditions in my State, and stated that several of the counties in the State have been authorized, by an act of the legislature, to issue bonds. Of course that money will not be used for the purpose of refunding. It is entirely new business. I asked the question if those bonds would be acceptable, and I was told by some of the members of the Finance Committee that any member of the capital issues committee who would refuse to accept such bonds ought to be sent to some insane asylum. I was glad to have that statement, of course, but it does not really satisfy me that the bonds would be accepted by this committee. I want to ask the Senator if, in his opinion as a lawyer, this would not apply to the bonds issued by the counties the same as if they were issued by the State?

Mr. STERLING. I am inclined to think not. I do not believe that class of bonds would fall under the provisions of my amendment, for the reason that they are not payable by the State. In the amendment which I have offered the bonds are to be bonds issued or authorized by the State and payable by the State, whereas in the case cited by the Senator from North Dakota the bonds would be payable by the county or the local subdivision.

Mr. GRONNA. That is true; they would be payable by the county.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The amendment of the Senator from South Dakota makes no attempt to restrict the State in its issuance of bonds. It, however, gives no authority to the municipality to do so.

Mr. STERLING. It gives no authority whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In the case of the State, it frequently occurs now that States that have had no bonded indebtedness for many years have recently incurred an indebtedness purely for war purposes.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My State, for instance, has agreed to the issuance of $5,000,000 of securities, because the legislature meets only once in two years, and this was the form in which they desired to meet certain war expenses. That having been done, however, the bill could not reach such a case nor affect even the refunding of that class of bonds, even if the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is not adopted. It seems to me, however, that there might appropriately be a restriction upon the form of the security issued and its purpose.

Mr. STERLING. My main thought in regard to that is, I will say to the Senator from Michigan, upon the issuance of State bonds, especially when we consider their own State constitutional limitations upon the amount of bonds that may be issued and the purposes for which the bonds may be issued, it ought to be assumed that under those conditions they were necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to say this, if the Senator will permit me, that under the bill as it now stands the State of Michigan could issue its bonds and could sell them in its own way without violating the letter or spirit of this law.

Mr. STERLING. I admit that the bonds may be sold by the State, but the disapproval of those bonds by this committee would surely affect the negotiation and sale of the bonds. It might utterly prevent the sale of the bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This committee might disapprove a security issued by the State of Michigan until it was black in the face and it would not affect the standing of that security, because the State banks and private individuals in our State would take the bonds of Michigan very quickly. The war debt is the only indebtedness we have, and Michigan bonds are perfectly good. I do not believe that the bill in its present form seriously restricts the State, and I would not want it to do so.

Mr. STERLING. Let me say to the Senator from Michigan that all States are not in so fortunate a situation as the State of Michigan. They have not the capital that his State has and there would not be the ready disposal of bonds within the State to capitalists or financial interests that there would be in the State of Michigan. Take the newer States, for example, like my own. They would have to negotiate their bonds outside the State, at the financial centers of the country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator. I yield the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to answer the suggestion that even in the State of Michigan, so well situated financially, as the Senator said, I imagine that, with the disapproval of this committee, the banks would hesitate somewhat before they invested in the securities, because the connection of this committee with the Federal Reserve System and the control that it would have through all the financial avenues of the country would well make any bank anywhere hesitate against their objection that they put any of their money into any of the bonds that had the disapproval of this committee.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I can very well conceive how that might be the case even in the State of Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course I can not let the statement of the Senator from Nebraska pass unchallenged in so far as it relates to my State, because the State owes nothing except its war debt. It borrowed $5,000,000 for war purposes and is expending the money in the public interests. I say under this bill there would be found a ready market for those bonds. Indeed, the ink on them was not dry before they were taken, and they will be taken again, even though this bill passes.

Mr. NORRIS. This bill, of course, will not affect those bonds, but notwithstanding the financial credit and lack of indebtedness of the State of Michigan—and I admit it all; I am not finding fault at all with the Senator's State—a bank connected with the Federal reserve bank or any other big financial institution would hesitate before it used its money, no matter how plentiful it might be, to invest in securities that were condemned by this committee. It does not mean that the banks would not have the money or anything of that kind, but they are connected with the entire financial system. I am not finding fault with the financial institutions for doing it. I think it would be a natural thing that they would not want to invest their money in such securities.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the Senator I think there are several hundred banks in the State of Michigan that are not at all affiliated with the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. NORRIS. They are not directly affiliated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are gradually coming into the Federal System. I believe that under this bill, if it becomes a law, our State may issue the war securities and go on the market and sell them without in any way infringing this act or subjecting themselves to the disapproval of the committee.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I understand under section 7 of the bill as amended a State would not be obliged to present its bonds to this board in any event for approval. There is nothing compulsory about it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are not obliged to do it.

Mr. NELSON. A State, therefore, is not obliged to present its bonds before this commission. I think it would be of great advantage to the States, if they felt they had bonds that would meet the approval of the board, to submit them to the board and get their approval. It would afford them a bigger and better market than they could otherwise get. For that reason, as section 7 has been amended, if this was a matter which pertained to the State of Minnesota I should be very glad to have the board pass upon the bonds, because it would give them an extra credit in the money market to have the approval of the board.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Minnesota, of course, understands that the only function of this committee is to investigate the issue, and after they have investigated the issue they may approve or disapprove, and there the matter ends, except so far as it may influence the action of the Federal reserve banks in accepting such loans or the financial corporation in loaning its money direct upon this class of securities. The Senator's suggestion that they might submit to an investigation and have their security passed upon by this committee would probably give them added prestige, and I would not set up one standard for my own State and another for the State of the Senator from South Dakota. I think in meeting the situation which now confronts us all the States are all entitled to full consideration. State expenses must be met in the manner best calculated to preserve their credit.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] if he thinks for a single moment that there could be any possibility of this board tabooing by their action any issue of a State intended to be for the general benefit of the public, and especially as assistance in carrying on the war, such as is suggested by the Senator from Michigan. The very purpose of the bill and the purpose of this section, reading the very first clause, is that it is for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of this war. The bonds that are issued by the State of Michigan are issued for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war. There can be no possibility that any member of a board would think of objecting to anything of that character any more than he would think of objecting in the case suggested by my colleague, of a State or county issue of bonds to buy seed wheat for farmers to plant their crops in 1918. One of the necessary things for the prosecution of the war is to create a sufficient amount of food to support the people of this country and our allies, and for which we are paying out enormous sums. There could be no possibility that any board would do anything further than to encourage the bonds that are spoken of by my colleague. If they were presented to such a board, the board would put its O. K. on them immediately and assist in the sale of them.

I do not think that the amendment is at all necessary. I do not think that this board could interfere in any way with any ordinary State issue unless it was so abnormally large that it threatened to invade the field of investment where the Government itself must look for the money to carry on the war.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota before he takes his seat, if the committee will not have the power under the terms of the bill to say whether or not the bonds proposed to be issued by a State are necessary or unnecessary. Under the very terms of the bill they have that power, have they not?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not say that they would pass upon the question whether they were necessary or unnecessary. They would pass upon the question whether they were conducive to the public interest in carrying on the war, or whether they were not conducive to the public interest in the prosecution of the war, and I think they ought to have the right to do that. That is the very purpose of the bill.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from North Dakota has now put a broader construction upon the bill than I had supposed he would. If they are to have the power which he says they have under the terms of the bill, then that is the more reason for the amendment I have proposed. Under the Senator's construction they would have the right to say not only whether the issue of the bonds of the State under the limitations of the State constitution and the restrictions there found are necessary capital expenditures or not, but whether they were conducive to the public interest in carrying on the war.

Now, in answer to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] just a word. He referred to the fact that the State does not have to ask the approval of its bonds by this committee. That is true, and it is true with reference to every other interest. An association or corporation does not have, in the first instance, to ask the approval nor does a municipality have to ask the approval of the committee in the first instance. They probably would all ask the approval of the committee, knowing that after the issue and before negotiation and sale it will be determined by the committee whether it is a necessary capital expenditure or not, and it having been determined that it is unnecessary there will be no sale and negotiation of those securities.

That may be well enough with reference to all other securities, and I am willing to admit it for the purpose of the argument, except the securities issued by a State of the Union. In regard to these, it ought not to be left with this committee to determine whether or not they are for necessary capital expenditures. It ought to be assumed that they are, else the State would not have issued them.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] made quite an extended argument and prefaced it with a question which he propounded to me. The argument he made in following up the question before I had any opportunity to answer it seemed to indicate that he was of the opinion that I was finding fault with this committee for fear it would not do its duty. He said in case the State of Michigan submitted an issue to it there would not be any doubt but what the committee would put its O. K. on the bonds at once. I concede that. I never denied it. There is not any question in my mind about it. Assuming that the committee are fair-minded men, and I presume they will be, there will not be any doubt about it. But that does not do away with the right that they would have if the bill is not amended to pass on the bonds issued by a State of the Union, and that is the question involved in the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota. No State, no municipality, no corporation of any kind is required under the bill to go to this committee, but the committee has the power, connected up as it is with the financial interests of the entire Government, and with the Secretary of the Treasury, when it puts its denunciation on a bond to prevent it from circulating in the financial markets of the United States or anywhere in the world.

It is a good deal like the Food Administration. They do a great many things indirectly that the statute does not give them the right to do directly. They fixed the price of wheat this year without any statute specifically saying that they had the power, but because of their control of elevators and mills, and under the licensing system, because of the enormous amount of grain that it takes for our Army and Navy and for the allies and the neutrals, they were absolutely empowered to say what the price of wheat should be to every man in the United States, and that is what the committee did.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For 1917?

Mr. NORRIS. I have reference to the 1917 crop. This committee would not have any technical legal authority to say to South Dakota you can not issue your bonds, but if they disapproved of them after they were issued the bonds would not sell. If that is not true, then you had better wipe this committee off of the face of the earth, because it has no other power. That is what it is there for, and that is what it will do. That is its proper function.

The amendment in effect provides that they shall have nothing to do with the bonds of a State. In other words, we conclusively presume in the case of a State that the bonds are issued for proper purposes and that the money is going to be used for a proper purpose. It seems to me it is not going too far to say when State bonds are issued we will assume conclusively that the bonds are all right. Every State has a constitution. Every State is loyal, and they have limitations in their constitutions as to the amount and the purposes for which bonds may be issued.

It seems to me, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota is a proper one and ought to be agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator another question, and will follow the same rule I did before in answering my own question. I do not assume at all that there will be many cases, if any, in which the committee will ever pass judgment against the issue of any State bonds, but I do not want the power there for it to do so. Suppose the State of Ohio would conclude in 1918 that it desired to expend $500,000,000 in draining some of the swamp land in that State, a work which could not be completed for five years, or until after the war was over, and that they would not only expend that $500,000,000 during the time the Government was making every effort in the world to raise money to carry on the war, but they would take 5,000 or 10,000 men, whose services ought to be utilized either upon the firing line or in the munition or shipbuilding plants, and set them to work digging ditches out in the State of Ohio. I believe there ought to be the power lodged in this committee to say that it is against the interest of the United States to attempt to float those bonds at this time, and I do not want to take that power away from the committee.

Mr. STERLING and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know who first addressed the Chair. I will yield first to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I merely wish to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he thinks the constitution of the State of Ohio or the constitution of any other State would permit such an excessive issue of bonds?

Mr. McCUMBER. As $500,000,000?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. Ohio is out of debt, and I believe there is nothing in the constitution to prevent her from raising funds up to that amount. New York, I think, expended about $500,000,000 in the last two years for her good roads. I know she spent over $200,000,000, and I do not know how much more has been paid by the counties. I ask the simple question whether the power ought not to be lodged in this committee to say to a State, as well as a municipality, "Do not go into improvements at this time which can not be completed in several years and take the money of the country and the labor of the country, which we so badly need now in the prosecution of the war."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, I just have one or two comments to make on the point raised by the Senator from North Dakota. The consideration which appeals to me as being rather important when we attempt by inference to lodge power in Federal boards or committees to prevent a State from doing what it wants in the matter of borrowing money is this: In a large majority of instances when a State seeks to issue bonds in large amounts the issuing is done following a vote of the people of the State. To my mind it would be an insufferable condition for a committee of five gentlemen at Washington to tell, for instance, the people of the State of New York, after they had voted in a popular referendum to issue $10,000,000 of bonds for the extension of the public highways of that State, that they can not sell their bonds. To my mind that is an invasion—it is true, by an indirect method—but if I take the word of the Senator from North Dakota, literally, nevertheless, an effective invasion of the sovereignty of the State of New York which is intolerable.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Is there any difference between a municipal security and the bonds of a State or county, as far as the invasion of the power of the State is concerned?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not pose as a constitutional lawyer, but it strikes me that the only sovereignty of the country is in 48 States of the Union, and the municipalities are not sovereignties. I do not want the committee here at Washington to tell the people of a sovereign State that they can not borrow money.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not believe the Federal Government has any more power over the issue of bonds by a subdivision of a State than of the State.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That may be so; but if the power were exercised over the State, in my mind, it would be more serious than an attempt to exercise it over a municipality. Of course, the bill does not say in so many words they can exercise that power; but the Senator from North Dakota wants them to have that power, and assumes that it can be exercised by this indirect method.

Mr. McCUMBER. Only exercising it by declaring that, in their opinion, they deem it inadvisable in the interest of the country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I stated before the committee that I do not believe we have any authority to authorize the committee to prohibit the issuance and sale of bonds upon the part of a State or any subdivision thereof. The provision in the bill does not go that far. It is simply advisory, and if the law is desirable, if it is important to place a check upon the expenditures at this time, as far as the advice of a skilled committee can place a check, it seems to me that it ought to extend even as far as the State.

I repeat, I do not think it is of any consequence legally; but if this commission could discourage at this time the reckless expenditure of money, I can conceive of nothing more for the general good, more in consonance with patriotic duty, than to do that very thing. I do not believe that this goes too far.

The Senator from South Dakota himself has stated that the voluntary committee now in existence has reported to him that it would not inhibit even by indirection the issuance or sale of bonds such as he has mentioned. I can not conceive of a condition of that kind that would arise. I could also as readily conceive in any other case where a concern asked for money or asked to issue its bonds and sell them the Government would discourage them if it was not for a patriotic purpose. They may make mistakes, perhaps.

But, Mr. President, much as I deplore the necessity of this kind of legislation, and I think it is deplorable, yet I was convinced that something of this kind was absolutely necessary. The great lesson this country has got to learn, and it is learning slowly, is that of economy. It must learn the lesson that everybody has got to contribute to the success of this war and that money, which is going to be needed in large volume, should be conserved for the interests of the Government in the war. If a State thinks it is a proper time to issue bonds which require money from the people to build roads in this urgent time, and even the people themselves vote to do it, I think if the Federal Government by stating the facts to the country should discourage it, it would perform a very patriotic duty to the country at this time.

Mr. STERLING. Let me ask the Senator if he does not think the States themselves and the authorities of the several States would not be governed by some such considerations as he now mentions? They will know the conditions as to war; they will know that there should not be extravagant expenditures; and they will restrain themselves in the matter of needed improvements even in order that the country may be secure in such a time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is to be presumed that the States will act in that way. It might be presumed that every patriotic business man in the country will do the same thing. If every man, every State, every municipality, did its duty, we would need no legislation at all, and that would be a very happy condition; but the fact is that we need legislation in some instances. I do not wish to be invidious and speak about any particular State, because I may be mistaken about it, but the report has already come to us that some States are going to take advantage of conditions which would materially embarrass the country at this time.

I do not think this provision is anything to be afraid of. It is not compulsory. It is purely advisory. This skilled commission investigates and reports that it is not compatible with the public interest to float certain bonds. If that will retard them and will enable the Government to obtain money that is needed for war purposes, then I am in favor of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let the amendment be read again.

The SECRETARY. In the substitute, after the words "United States" insert the words "nor to the securities issued by or under the authority of any State and payable by the State."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are called for. Is the call seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. STERLING. I call for a division, Mr. President.

The question being put, on a division the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the substitute for section 7 as it has been amended.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to an inconsistency in the section. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] offered an amendment, which was agreed to, by which the President is to appoint the members of this board, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. About the middle of the amendment, which I have in my hands, there is this provision:

> The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

In view of the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, it ought to read:

> The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the President of the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not object to that amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be the proper language, and I offer that amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon concurring in the substitute as amended.

The substitute as amended was concurred in.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, it was stated yesterday, and I think it was agreed to by unanimous consent, that section 8 of the bill should be reexamined when the bill reached the Senate. Since then the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, has adopted a section regarding penalties which is, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] suggests, inconsistent with section 8 as adopted. Unless some Senator can suggest some reason for the retention of section 8 I ask unanimous consent that it be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that section 8 be stricken from the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have not thoroughly and maturely considered the question that has been raised, but I do not think that section 8 should be stricken from the bill. I think the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire relating to the penalties to be imposed for the forgery of the bonds or the embezzlement of the funds of the corporation is confined by its terms to those specific offenses and that the adoption of the amendment does not at all militate against the reasons which led the Senate to adopt the substitute for section 8, which refers to offenses for violation of the provisions of the bill. So we have one general section in the bill which imposes penalties of $1,000 fine or a year's imprisonment for a violation of the provisions of the bill, and then we have another section which makes certain acts against the property of the corporation—not against the provisions of the bill but against the property of the corporation—either the embezzling of its property or the forging of its securities, specific offenses and provides a specific penalty much higher than the penalty prescribed for a violation of the provisions of the bill.

It does not strike me that the two things are inconsistent; and I hope the Senate will not eliminate section 8. When the matter is in conference we shall have an opportunity to very thoroughly investigate and consider the question. If, then, we discover that I am mistaken and those who agree with me are mistaken and that there is any inconsistency, we can take care of it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Colorado will pardon the Chair for a moment, the Chair desires to say that he is of the opinion that if the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire is now not in order, it is at least superfluous. A vote was reserved as in Committee of the Whole upon the substitute for section 8. So, in due course, a vote in the Senate will be taken upon concurring in the substitute, and the question will then be determined by the Senate, without the necessity of such a motion as that now made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. May that question come up now, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the question of concurring in the substitute for section 8 can be considered now.

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask that the substitute for section 8 be now laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that may be done. The question now is upon concurring in the substitute for section 8, which was adopted as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think if this section is inconsistent with section 2, which we adopted this morning, it is the duty of the Senate to eliminate it from the bill and not to relegate it to the committee of conference. When section 8 was being considered yesterday the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] made the statement that he was unable to find any section of the bill which was susceptible of criminal violation after we had stricken out section 7 or so amended section 7 as reported by the committee as to eliminate many of its features and virtually to change its scope.

Section 8 is a general section. It provides that any person who shall violate any of the provisions and terms of the bill shall be punished by a fine of $1,000 or by imprisonment for a year or both. The best reason perhaps why that section should be eliminated is that there is no offense which can be committed under the bill to which that would relate, unless, of course, we take into consideration the amendment which was made this morning. There is no need, in other words, of placing a penal section in the bill when there is nothing to be penalized. I have not been able—and I have made a careful investigation of the bill this morning—to find any violation which can be predicated on the bill to which section 8 will apply. I think the Senator from Alabama is correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I call the Senator's attention to one such provision on page 5 of the amended bill?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 4, section 5, of the amended bill—that is, the print which was made on March 2—the Senator will find it. If the Senator will read the amendment at the top of that page, he will see a provision for the violation of which punishment should be inflicted.

Mr. THOMAS. The provision to which the Senator from North Dakota refers reads:

> No director or officer of the Corporation shall in any manner participate in the determination of any question affecting his personal interests.

The copy of the bill which I examined this morning was not the print which I now hold in my hand. However, Mr. President, assuming that there are provisions of this bill the violation of which should be punished, and that consequently section 8 should be retained in the bill, then it should be limited to those offenses not covered by section 2 for the commission of which the offender is convicted.

Section 2, accepted upon the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] this morning, prohibits the embezzlement of the funds of the proposed bank; it prohibits the forgery of any of its securities or of its bonds, and it provides a penalty of $5,000 fine for each of such violations. If I remember aright, it also provides for a term of imprisonment as the alternative. That is specific; it is intelligible; but section 8, previously adopted, provides that any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be subject to the penalty of $1,000 only, or imprisonment for one year only, or both. As I said this morning, in a penal statute that construction would be followed which would be most liberal to the offender; in other words, penal statutes are always strictly construed. If both these sections remain in the bill, the manifest inconsistency of providing that offenses shall be punished by a fine of $5,000 and that the same offenses shall be punishable by a fine of $1,000 will cause a great deal of difficulty in the construction of the law and in its application in given cases.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield the floor, Mr. President?

Mr. HOLLIS. But I should like the Senator's opinion as to this suggestion: Would it not meet the objection if section 8, as finally adopted, should be amended so that the first line should read: "That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act in any particular not specifically provided for herein"?

Mr. THOMAS. That will cover the difficulty.

Mr. HOLLIS. If that is agreeable to the chairman, we might agree to that.

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, to waive the objection that I make to section 8 as amended if the addition which is suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire is made to it.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought while the Senator from New Hampshire was speaking that if we should merely insert the words "the preceding provisions" or the words "not otherwise specifically provided for" it might be sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has suggested an amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS I suggest that there be inserted the words "in any particular not specifically provided for herein."

Mr. SIMMONS. That would meet the point that the Senator from Colorado is making.

Mr. THOMAS. My only purpose is to harmonize the two sections with each other.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "act." at the end of line 1, it is proposed in the amendment to insert "in any particular not specifically provided for herein."

Mr. THOMAS. It should read "not otherwise specifically provided for herein."

Mr. WILLIAMS. "Not otherwise specifically provided for."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert "in any particular not otherwise specifically provided for herein," so that if amended it will read:

That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act, in any particular not otherwise specifically provided for herein, shall upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be fined not more than $1,000—

And so forth.

Mr. LODGE. As I heard the amendment read it seems to me to be obnoxious to all the objections I ventured to submit to it yesterday; in other words, it is putting it back in the form in which it was, so that it will apply to the licensing provision, and I think that is dangerous legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the proposed amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the proposed substitute.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the substitute as agreed to as in Committee of the Whole by adding after the words "this act," in line 1, the following words: "in any particular not otherwise specifically provided for herein," so that if amended it will read:

That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act, in any particular not otherwise specifically provided for herein, shall, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned—

And so forth.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will venture to inquire whether the words "not otherwise specifically provided for" would not apply to a violation of the rules and regulations, a proposal that was very seriously objected to in the debate a couple of days ago? It so strikes me, although I may be wrong about it. If they would so apply I should not feel like voting for the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the substitute agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the junior Senator from New Hampshire, who offered this amendment, if he does not think that the same purpose would be accomplished, without incurring the objection presented by the Senator from Massachusetts and the senior Senator from New Hampshire, if it were made to read "that whoever shall willfully violate any of the foregoing provisions"?

Mr. HOLLIS. The words "foregoing provisions" would include counterfeiting and embezzling, because the provision relating to those acts come before this provision in the bill.

Mr. LODGE. There is the same objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Carolina as to the one offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am ready to withdraw my suggestion, if that is agreeable to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think this matter had better be left as it is. This will not be a final disposition of the matter; the conferees will have control of it, and then we can adjust it after careful consideration.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I withdraw my amendment to section 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire is withdrawn. The question is on concurring in the substitute amendment for section 8, which has just been read and which was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have not yet all been concurred in. There were other amendments reserved before the bill was reported to the Senate, and I now ask for the consideration of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole in lines 4, 5, 6, and 7, on page 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 5, on page 4, as in Committee of the Whole the following words were stricken from the bill, as recommended by the committee:

Shall devote their entire time to the business of this Corporation (except such part of their time, if any, as shall be devoted to other governmental business) and.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, this matter has been debated once at least, and it seems to me entirely reasonable that the members of this corporation should devote themselves to this war work solely without dividing their attention between this and some private business. The members of the Federal Reserve Board are required to do it, and, as I have already indicated to-day, soldiers who are drafted to serve in the Army at a moderate compensation are obliged to give their whole time to it. Certainly men who are appointed to perform the very important duties of this office, with a salary of $12,000 a year, ought to give their whole time to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the recommendation of the committee is rejected, I think we ought to include in the bill a provision that United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives shall devote their entire time to the service of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I simply wish to say I do not think this language has ever been applied except in the case of the Federal Reserve Board to any officer whose office has been created or who has been appointed by the Federal Government. This is only a temporary organization; it is not a permanent institution. The law presumes that every officer of the Government will give such time as is necessary to perform the functions and duties of the position and he swears faithfully to execute the duties of his office. I have never heard of a State putting a provision of this sort in any of its statutes and I have never heard of the United States Government putting a provision of this sort in its statutes as a qualification upon an officer appointed to a governmental position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. (Putting the question:) The "noes" have it, and the amendment is nonconcurred in.

Mr. HOLLIS. I now ask to have laid before the Senate the amendment at the bottom of page 4 and the top of page 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was under the impression that the amendment, the question on concurring in which was just put, had been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole and was concurred in in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so state. It was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole and disagreed to in the Senate, so that the original language is restored to the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not understand how that can be.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, my understanding is that as in Committee of the Whole the Senate sustained the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. With one amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. By inserting the word "active" before the word "of."

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and the Senator from New Hampshire reserved the right to ask for a separate vote in the Senate. He has asked for that vote, and I understand the Senate now sustains the committee amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. I understand the Chair has ruled to the contrary.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senate voted under a misapprehension. I think I am the only Senator who voted to concur in the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am inclined to think the Senator from North Dakota is correct. The vote in the Senate, as was the vote as in Committee of the Whole, was a vote to determine whether this provision should remain in the bill as originally written; and we have voted here to strike it out, contrary to our intentions. I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken over.

Mr. HOLLIS. To that I object.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the vote whereby the amendment was nonconcurred in may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Chair please state the question that we voted on a little while ago?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Chair incorrectly stated the question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to have the RECORD show, because I thought I was voting right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As in Committee of the Whole it was voted, as the Chair is advised, to strike out certain words found in section 5, on page 4 of the bill, in lines 4, 5, and 6, and a portion of line 7. The question in the Senate was on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the way the Chair put it before, and we voted "aye."

Mr. TOWNSEND. What was the result of the vote? How did the Chair decide?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote was negative upon the proposition as submitted by the Chair upon concurring in the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Then, Mr. President, the Senator did not understand the question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I voted in the negative under a misapprehension, supposing that the question had been put otherwise. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was nonconcurred in.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have made that motion.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, if there was a misapprehension, I will withdraw my objection to the request for unanimous consent and agree that the vote may be taken over, if the Chair will now state it so that the Senate will understand how they are voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment on page 4, lines 4, 5, and 6, and a portion of line 7, made as in Committee of the Whole. As in Committee of the Whole it was agreed to strike out of the bill the lines to which the Chair has referred. Now the question is on concurring in the action taken as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. Those who wish to sustain the action taken as in Committee of the Whole will vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS. Those who wish to sustain the action of the committee will vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE. Those who are in favor of sustaining the action of the committee will vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment, and then the Chair will put the motion.

The SECRETARY. As in Committee of the Whole, in sustaining the Senate Committee on Finance, the following words were stricken from the bill, on page 4, beginning in line 4:

Shall devote their entire time to the business of the corporation, except such part of their time, if any, as shall be devoted to other governmental business) and.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the action of the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. HOLLIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement that I made upon the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair that I announced on the previous roll call, I withhold my vote, on account of the absence of my pair.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Notwithstanding my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is necessarily detained from the Chamber—because if he were present he would vote the same way that I vote—I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WEEKS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING. Has the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina to the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the negative). I ask if the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. HARDING. Because of my general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama, I withdraw the negative vote which I cast.

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—46.

Baird	King	Reed	Sutherland

So the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire advise the Chair of the extent of the next amendment reserved by him for a separate vote in the Senate?

Mr. HOLLIS. I will not ask for a vote on that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is upon concurring in the remainder of the amendments to section 5.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. SIMMONS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's name was called). I announce the absence of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], occasioned by personal illness.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. JAMES's name was called). I announce the absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], occasioned by personal illness.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Repeating my announcement made on a previous roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. PENROSE's name was called). The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made by me on the previous roll call as to my vote and the reason therefor, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OWEN. I answer "present," refraining from voting. If it were necessary for me to vote "yea" to pass this bill, I would vote "yea" rather than see the relief fail which I desire the country to have in any event, whether by this bill or by the substitute which I offered. As it is not necessary, and as the bill does not meet with my approval in its present form, and as I do not approve the manner in which it has been forced through the Senate without consulting the Committee on Banking and Currency, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMOOT. The RECORD will show that the rule has not been complied with in the request made by the Senator from Oklahoma. The rule provides that whenever a Senator asks to be excused from voting the matter must be submitted to the Senate, and the Senate decides the question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of sickness.

The result was announced—yeas 74, nays 3, as follows:

YEAS—74.

Baird	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Smoot
Bankhead	Kellogg	Page	Sterling

So the bill was passed.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9314) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the bill ought to be read. It is not a long bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the first page of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I withdraw the objection I interposed with regard to dispensing with the formal reading of the bill, and, as far as I am concerned, will let it be read for action on the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill for action on the committee amendments.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Salaries of secretaries in the Diplomatic Service," on page 3, line 21, after the word "Total," to strike out "$202,800" and insert "$317,905," so as to make the clause read:

Total, $317,905.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Transportation of diplomatic and consular officers in going to and returning from their posts," on page 7, line 19, after the words "Secretary of State," to insert "at the rate of not exceeding 10 cents per mile," so as to make the clause read:

To pay the actual and necessary expenses of transportation under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, of diplomatic and consular officers and clerks in embassies, legations, and consulates in going to and returning from their posts, or when traveling under orders of the Secretary of State, at the rate of not exceeding 10 cents per mile, but not including any expense incurred in connection with leaves of absence, $125,000.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. It seems to me that at this time it is an unfortunate one. The men who are at these posts, obliged to come home—recalled, perhaps, as we recalled all our consuls in Turkey, for example—come home on the public business. They can not, as in normal times, travel directly by train and steamship.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator that if he will let that amendment go over we will go on with the bill and come back to that, if he has no objection.

Mr. LODGE. Why should it take any time to discuss the amendment? We have got to discuss it sooner or later.

Mr. OVERMAN. All right.

Mr. LODGE. I mean, why not now? I am perfectly willing to pass it over if the Senator desires, but I think we can finish the bill in a few minutes, this matter included. I am not going to speak at any length.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we can not finish the bill to-night.

Mr. LODGE. Why not?

Mr. SMOOT. Because there are a number of items in the bill that will lead to discussion.

Mr. LODGE. There are only one or two other amendments here.

Mr. SMOOT. There are some items in the bill itself that are going to lead to discussion.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, well, if there is going to be discussion of a lot of items, we might as well go on with this matter now.

Mr. SMOOT. It is 5 o'clock now.

Mr. LODGE. If Senators want to adjourn, of course I will not go on.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand that the Senate is weary. I understand, also, that an executive session is desired. With the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. LODGE. I yield, of course, for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 8, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 7, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Oh, Thou, who art supremely great, an imminent God, working in and through everything; creating, re-creating; upholding, sustaining, guiding all; presiding over the destiny of men and of nations;

That God, which ever lives and loves,
One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off divine event,
To which the whole creation moves—

make us, we beseech Thee, sensible of our dependence upon Thee, for life and all things; and help us to fulfill our destiny, as individuals and as a nation, as it is disclosed to us, moment by moment, hour by hour, as the years come and go; that we may be the instruments in Thy hands, for the furtherance of Thy purposes, as revealed in the life, character, and sublime precepts of the Jesus of Nazareth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. I object. I desire to raise the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman defer that just a moment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask the gentleman to withhold that for a moment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withhold his point?

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman can have the floor when a quorum is present.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is not willing to yield, then?

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. KITCHIN. In order to save time why not wait until the motion is made to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and then let there be a roll call on that?

Mr. DOWELL. I think this is the proper time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Young, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 7998. An act granting the consent of Congress to the village of East Dundee and the village of West Dundee to construct a bridge across the Fox River.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 6361. An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war.

THE SPEAKER'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. This is the birthday of the Speaker of the National House of Representatives. [The Members rose and applauded.]

I want to say just a word. I was Speaker when he was on the floor of the House, and now when I am on the floor of the House he is Speaker. While at times I do not agree with him about policies, yet, looking him in the eye, I want to say that he intends, as Speaker of the House of Representatives, to be correct in his rulings and at all times is fair and courteous. [Applause.] I wish him many recurring anniversaries, and that he may live to be a hundred years old, and then run a foot race, intellectually and physically. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I have to plead guilty to being 68 years old. They say that a woman is no older than she looks and that a man is no older than he feels. If that is so, I am no older than I was when I entered this House 25 years ago. [Applause.] There is not a man on earth in better health than I am, for which blessing I humbly and fervently thank Almighty God. [Applause.]

To talk about the House of Representatives is always an enticing theme to me. I really believe that I am the only man living who always takes up the cudgels for the House. No man ever says anything against it when I am present that I do not get back at him. [Applause.]

Out of the 68 years of my life I have spent 23 years in this House, and they have been very active ones, too. I made more speeches in the first Congress that I was here than I have made in any three Congresses since. [Laughter.] It came about in a very peculiar way. I was nominated over a sitting Member, a fine man, very handsome, a man of intelligence and ability, a fine lawyer, who had been here for four years. We were doing everything on earth that was proper—and in the retrospect I am afraid we did some things that were improper—to carry the election. Among other things, I charged that he had not been as active during his four years here as he ought to have been, considering his ability. He countered with the proposition that a man had to be here four years before he could branch out much, or the old Members would run over him roughshod. I answered that if a man had in him the stuff out of which statesmen were made he could go to the front whenever he got ready. That pleased the audience. [Laughter.] But when I got here I found that I was under obligation to make that promise good, and hence the number of speeches I made in that Congress.

This House changes about one-quarter every two years. Amos J. Cummings, one of the most beloved men that ever sat in this House, a great newspaper man, said that the average life of a Congressman was four years. One of two things is true—either he was wrong then or time and circumstances have changed, for the average life of a Congressman here now is a little over seven years. I think the primary elections have a tendency to increase the tenure of the sitting Member.

There are only four men here now who have been here longer than I have. Mr. CANNON has been here longer than anybody ever was. [Applause.] I am sure that I express the sentiment of every man in this House, whatever his politics or religion, or anything else may be, we all hope that he will serve in this House as long as he lives. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON and I have had some right hot times in this House together. [Laughter.] They were not glove contests but with bare knuckles. [Laughter.] In addition to the ex-Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] have served longer than I have, and the service of my good friend from Maryland, Mr. TALBOTT, extends back almost into the twilight of fable. [Laughter and applause.] If he had stayed here all the time consecutively, he would outrank anybody that ever was here except Mr. Speaker CANNON, but he has been off and on in his service—a good deal off as well as on. [Laughter.]

It is a noble privilege to be a Member of the House of Representatives. Very few people can ever attain it, and it is a high privilege to be a Speaker of this House. There have been 36 of us, counting one man who was Speaker one day. I have a great many things to be thankful for—a good wife, good children, a boy in the Army [applause], a fine grandson 13 months old—never been sick a minute in his life. [Applause.] He looks like his granddad. [Laughter and applause.]

I am thankful for troops of friends, and nowhere is there a more loving troop than in this House. [Applause.] I thank you for this evidence of your love and affection. Mr. Speaker CANNON says that I always try to be right, and I do, and if I find I am wrong I change it. I look upon the Speakership with the same high regard that a judge of a high court should regard his judicial duties, and I would be ashamed of myself forever and eternally if I ever made a partisan ruling in this House. [Prolonged applause.]

EAST ST. LOUIS RIOTS.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent for permission to the special committee on the East St. Louis riots to make their report in the House, when they do make it, instead of filing it in the basket. I do not know what the report is to contain, but I assume that it will be a report dealing with the facts, and will call a spade a spade. The subject of the report is of sufficient importance to justify the widest publicity. So I ask unanimous consent that when the report is made it may be made in the House.

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to have the report published. I would like to know if the gentleman intends to include in the request the publication of the testimony taken on the investigation?

Mr. MADDEN. I should be delighted to have the testimony printed. I really think it ought to be printed, and if that will lead to getting unanimous consent to my request, I will include that in my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent that the special committee appointed to investigate the matters at East St. Louis may make their report in open House instead of filing it through the basket. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he can state to the House how much testimony has been taken and how many printed pages it will make?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the testimony is very voluminous, but very important to the people of the country, and especially to the people of my State. Every suggestion that has been made by anybody in our State is to the effect that they would like to have the testimony published.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that the gentleman is only making a request that the testimony be printed?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And not made a part of the regular report?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the special committee appointed to investigate the matters at East St. Louis shall report in open House instead of filing their report through the basket, and that the testimony be printed with the report. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. I object.

Mr. MADDEN. Not with the report, Mr. Speaker, but as a public document.

Mr. BLACK. I am going to object if it means the printing of all this testimony.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not object to that.

Mr. BLACK. I think it is just like the testimony in the Industrial Relations matter; of no use to anybody, and I object.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, then, that the committee make its report in the open House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that when the committee makes its report it make it in the House instead of through the basket. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman from Texas withdraw his objection to printing the testimony?

The SPEAKER. Let us get through with this request first. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES FOR LATE REPRESENTATIVE HELGESEN.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the memorial exercises for the late Representative HELGESEN, of North Dakota, be held on the 10th of March next at 12 o'clock instead of on the 24th of March.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to change the date for the memorial services for the late Representative HELGESEN from the 24th to the 10th of March. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10358, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last there was under consideration a point of order made by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] to the increase of pay for the head of the Efficiency Bureau. I will ask the gentleman to withhold that for a few minutes, until I can discuss it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to appeal to my colleague who made this point of order to withdraw it, and I want to present if I can an aspect of the subject which may not have occurred to him. It is impossible on these isolated and sporadic cases to discuss the relative value of public services and the relative scale of salaries, and so forth. It is easy enough to say that some man's salary has been increased, and that there are a great many worthy and deserving cases that have not been increased. That kind of argument can go on forever, of course, without any particular result. I would not want to go into that, but I do want to say this in fairness to the subcommittee that drew the bill, that, as I recollect, there are only three increases of salary in this bill that amount to anything. One is the head of this Bureau of Efficiency and the other are the members of the Civil Service Commission, both of which I think are fully justified by exceptional circumstances. The committee was not disposed to increase salaries and held down rigidly every request that was made for that purpose. As to the poor clerks, the clerks that my colleague seems to be interested in, as a matter of fact, it is incorrect to say that those men's salaries have not been increased for a long term of years. While the salaries are fixed by law for the position, the personnel is fluctuating all the time, and men are constantly promoted from the lower to the higher grades, so that the salary of the low-class man does not remain fixed and stationary, and that impression is not quite an accurate one. Here is the point I desire to present to my colleague's mind: There is not a doubt in the world but that an expert accountant who is able to be at the head of the Efficiency Bureau is worth $5,000 a year in the open market. We pay that for bureau chiefs whose work is of infinitely less value to the public than this man's work. The great difficulty about increasing this particular salary is that this man has been doing very substantial work in saving money for the taxpayers of the United States. He has actually obtained results, and he occupies a peculiar position in the Federal Government. His position is not a popular one. He does not appeal to any of the element here in Washington that is so eager to increase the salaries and add to the Federal expenses. In fact, his work is absolutely opposed and brings him into sharp opposition with the element who desire to increase the burdens of the taxpayer.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Mr. BORLAND. In a moment I shall yield if I have the time. That is the reason why there has been such a persistent attack upon this man who is at the head of this bureau. He has been actually getting results, like any expert accountant ought to get results in a great business institution. He has been showing where money could be saved, not by the few dollars but by the hundreds of thousands of dollars, and if he had a wider opportunity for usefulness I am confident that he could make it more and more to the advantage of the taxpayers of the United States. That very fact, the very efficiency of this man and his usefulness in cutting down public expenditures and decreasing the burden of the taxpayer, has brought him sharply into conflict with some of the elements in this community who are not anxious to reduce the burdens of the taxpayer. I am sure my colleague does not want to put himself in the attitude of being in line with that element, and yet this is a direct attack upon this man to drive him out of the public service. They want to make it so unpleasant, so unprofitable personally for a man to be efficient and save money for the American taxpayer that he will not agree to stay; that he will not be able to afford to stay. This man could go into private employment as an expert accountant and get $5,000 a year.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. And the only thing that I know of that keeps him here is the high regard he has for the success of his work. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that he did eliminate 30 clerkships in the United States Treasury?

Mr. BORLAND. I could not give the exact figures in the various departments where he has been at work. He has reduced the number of clerkships, and he has promoted the efficiency of the public business. That is true also of the Post Office Department, where he has been at work, and I am quite sure that this attack, designed to drive him out of the service, is not in the mind of my colleague from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I have not made any attack upon this Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency. I do not even enjoy the pleasure of his acquaintance. There is nothing personal whatever in my action in reserving the point of order against an increase in his salary.

I do not know to what my colleague who has just spoken refers when he talks about certain interests who are very much opposed to this man and his work and intimates that I am aligning myself with that "certain interest," whatever it is, in seeking to drive this "efficiency expert" out of the service of the Government. I do know that I am not aligned with any interest except the public interest in endeavoring to hold down salary increases.

I repeat that I do not know to whom my colleague referred, but I have suspicion and shall assume that he had in mind when he made that insinuation the great army of clerks in the different departments of the Government, because he seems to have thoroughly convinced himself that he has a grievance against these clerks which he airs each day on the floor of the House, "lest we forget."

In reserving the point of order the only purpose I had in mind was to try to hold the balances level between the chiefs of the bureaus and the clerks who do the work.

There are certain expenses common to everybody employed here in Washington, regardless of whether they receive $360 a year or whether they receive $12,000 a year. A pound of meat, a pound of coffee, a pound of sugar, and all other vital necessities of life cost a man who is receiving only $360 a year just as much as it costs one receiving $12,000 a year. Now, until you get to the point of giving the employee enough money to meet these vital, necessary expenses you are going to hurt that fellow very badly, but after his salary reaches a point which will enable him to meet these necessary expenses and enjoy some of the comforts of life it does not make so much difference whether his salary is increased or not during the war. He is assured that the wolf can not get through the door, and if he is not able to lay up any money during war times it does not make so much difference. Now, I can not understand the theory of these gentlemen who are talking about this efficiency expert being so valuable and that if we do not give him this increase he is liable to leave the Government service and go into private life. It does not argue well for this man's patriotism for his friends upon this floor to make that threat to this House. It does not count any with me. There are any number of men who have left their private employment, have sacrificed their private businesses, and have volunteered their services and are to-day in Washington City serving this Government patriotically and faithfully for $1 per year.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Here is a man drawing $4,000, and his friends upon this floor say, "If you do not give him $1,000 a year more he will leave the service of the Government." If there is any patriotism in that, it is with profit. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. May I ask who may be this mysterious gentleman, what he does, and what he gets?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. I said I did not know him, and that is true. I think his name was given the other day as Brown. No doubt he is a good man, I am not saying that he is not, and perhaps he is rendering some good services, but I am saying there are plenty more men in the service of this Government who are rendering good services. He is not alone if he is rendering good service. Now, I want to call attention to another thing. He has been in the employ of this Government over two years or about two years. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House only recently called attention to a very important matter which this efficiency expert might have remedied to the good of the service. He said the system of bookkeeping in vogue in this Government was of such a character that you could not tell to save your life how the money when appropriated was expended, except that it was arranged so that you can keep tab——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. MOON. May I ask if the gentleman is going to insist on his point of order?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not think I shall.

Mr. MOON. Then why discuss it?

Mr. HAMLIN. I likely will explain before I close why I am not going to insist on the point of order. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Just let me finish this sentence—that the system of bookkeeping was so arranged that you could only keep tab upon one proposition, and that was as to whether a department had expended more money than appropriated for its use.

This is what the chairman of the Appropriations Committee said:

> Now, in order that that may happen we must have a reform in the methods of governmental bookkeeping. At present your governmental bookkeeping is for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that is to prevent embezzlement or misappropriation of funds, and it performs that service exceedingly well, but it performs no other. All of your appropriations are so made and your bookkeeping accounts so kept that they serve only in preventing Smith or Brown from spending money for some purpose other than that for which it was appropriated, but do not require or show economy of expenditure. There is no system by which the legislative body could take the expenditures of a previous period and from them determine whether they have been economically or wastefully expended; and as a result, in order to ascertain that, we go through a cross-examination of individuals that amounts at times to a severe grilling of them and frequently without obtaining any real result. When we find some abuse we come in and recommend a particular provision prohibiting the doing of something that we think brought on the abuse and we tie the hands, or try to tie the hands, of an incompetent administrative officer, and then wake up a few weeks afterwards and find we have also tied the hands of all the good administrative officers as well and that the bad administrative officer has usually found some method of circumventing the prohibition that we placed upon him.
> Now, if you will get a system so you can know whether an administrative officer is well or badly performing his functions, then the remedy will be not to curtail his power, but to cut off his head when he does not deliver. [Applause.] When he fails to show that he is an efficient officer let him go into the discard and let some man of capacity take his place. [Applause.] That is the tendency of all modern government everywhere except here on this floor and in national matters.

Now, I think what the chairman of the Appropriations Committee said is true because it accords with my experience in investigating the expenditures of the Government. Then, what has this efficiency expert, this splendid accountant, which my colleague talks about, been doing the last two years that he has not suggested some change in the system of bookkeeping that will enable us to know something about how this money that we appropriate is being used?

Now I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have been watching this matter of commissions for some time, and I understand that this particular one has cut down the expenses of certain of the departments. Does the gentleman observe that while cutting down the expenses of certain departments its own expenses have correspondingly increased?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Whereas they had $60,000 last year, they now ask $110,000——

Mr. HAMLIN. No; they had $40,000 the first year, the next year $60,000, and this year they ask for $120,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may not misunderstand, I want to say the bureau had $118,000 for the current year. There were two deficiency bills passed——

Mr. HAMLIN. I was just about to mention that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That does not appear in the corresponding legislative, executive, and judicial bill of last year. In the law of last year there appeared to be $60,000 appropriated, and in the corresponding item of this bill $110,000 is asked for——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But in the deficiency bill passed in October $20,000 additional was added, and in the bill which passed the other day the gentleman voted for $38,000 additional, making a total of $118,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I can not afford to yield further. The statement I made is absolutely accurate, that two years ago, the first year of this Efficiency Bureau, they asked for $40,000; then the next year for $60,000; and this time for $120,000; and then, as the chairman of the committee has said, there have already been two different deficiency appropriations made for this bureau. There seems to be no limit upon the amount of people they can employ. Now, perhaps that is all right. I do not know about that.

Here is the point I had in mind all the time and that I have in my mind now. We ought to be fair to all the people in the departments regardless of position occupied. Perhaps this man earns $5,000 a year, but I say that we ought not to increase these high-salaried men unless you are going to take care of the people of the rank and file and who do the work of the departments down in the bureau. I do not know that I shall finally make this point of order. I believe I ought to make it, but I have been appealed to, and this one statement has somewhat appealed to me. I am informed from a reliable source that there will be within the next few days brought in a proposition that is intended to take care of and will take care of, perhaps, the class of people that I believe ought to have some consideration as well as these very high-salaried men. Now, if that is done it eliminates very largely my objections to this increase of salaries of the higher-ups. And for that reason, and with this statement, I shall not insist upon this point of order, yet I feel that I ought to do so.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. RUCKER. The point of order is still pending, as I understand it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would like the point to be made, so that we can proceed.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, have I been recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the situation before the committee. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recognized for the purpose of debate, but the Chair wants to ascertain the status. Is the point of order made?

Mr. MOON. I made the point of order at the time the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] withdrew it. He has withdrawn his point of order. Then, I reserve it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. To what?

Mr. MOON. I reserve the point of order to the $110,000 a year, and I reserve the point of order to the increase in the salary.

Mr. GOOD. I hope the gentleman will reserve it. I would like to speak on the subject.

Mr. MOON. I am not going to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recognized to participate in the debate.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Tennessee will——

Mr. MOON. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], being a member of the committee, as a matter of courtesy is entitled to be recognized.

Mr. GOOD. I will waive that point if the gentleman will reserve his point of order, so that I can speak.

Mr. MOON. I will do this. The gentleman from Iowa can proceed now, and then I will make the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The reservation still exists.

Mr. MOON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recognized.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the President during the past few years has been called upon to make a great many appointments. I do not believe he has made an appointment during his entire incumbency as President of the United States that is more meritorious than the appointment of Mr. Herbert Brown as chief of this bureau. While the appropriations for this bureau have been increasing, the bureau has had greatly increased duties, and it has saved many times over the amounts appropriated for it. In the office of the Treasurer alone it saved many times all of the appropriation by Congress for the bureau in reducing the number of clerks in that department. It has gone into the other departments and has, by conducting examinations, and by installing scientific methods saved a great many thousands of dollars to the Government. I personally know a number of men who have followed the business of accounting and are expert accountants. I know that if you hire an expert accountant you can not get one for less than $20 to $50 per day. I have never come in contact with an expert accountant who knows his business any better than Mr. Brown and the little force that he has gathered around him.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] says that he has been in the employe of the Government for two years. Mr. Brown has been in the employ of the Government for more than 10 years. In the Sixty-first Congress he was in the employ of the Government, receiving then, in addition to his private employment—from which he had an income of almost $1,000—$4,000 a year. I do not believe there is any question about Mr. Brown receiving in private employment immediately more than $6,000 or $8,000 a year. He is worth to the Government of the United States more than he is worth to any person. I am sure that if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] will take this question up and look at it from a practical standpoint, from the standpoint of actual saving to the Government of the United States, as the committee that brought out this bill considered it, he would not think of making a point of order. He would only wonder that the committee had not in instances like this given even larger salaries to men of this character. I am sure I know of no Government employee or official who is more entitled to an increased salary in all the Government service than the man who is chief of this bureau. The gentleman from Tennessee I know is interested in the salaries of these lower paid clerks. But the committee has been considering the pay of lower paid clerks, and, as his colleague from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has already stated, will bring out a bill to take care of them. But in the meantime I hope he will not make a point of order, because if he does he then reduces the salary that this man is paid by $800 from the amount which he received in the Sixty-first Congress.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, my objection does not arise so much upon the mere increase of this particular salary, for I am sure I have no objection to Mr. Brown getting a proper salary, or anybody else getting a proper salary, if it is right to have it. But the objection goes further in that it is an objection to the exercise of power and jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations on this question, whether for one sum or another. They can not increase salaries.

Then, there is no merit, in my judgment, in this proposition anyway. This Bureau of Efficiency, which people sometimes call the "bureau of inefficiency," was a bureau in the Civil Service Department and in 1916 was established as a separate and independent bureau, and the office force that had been connected with that branch of the service, in the civil-service branch of the Government, went over to this bureau, and the money that they were limited to in the act creating them was $12,000 for expenditure for all the purposes connected with the efficiency system. Then, the next year there comes $40,000—a growth. And yet departments like the Agricultural Department, as I am advised, prohibit them from coming in the department to consider these questions affecting their clerks. I understand one branch of the Post Office Department does not permit it. It is not permitted to come into several of the departments; and there is no law compelling these examinations by these efficiency bureaus in any of the departments.

Then, in the next year they got $60,000, and then, as my friend and colleague from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] says, these deficiencies ran the amount up to $118,000. So you see we just have established a branch of a service that was practically an unimportant bureau in the Civil Service, and in three or four years it has grown ten times as great, so far as expenditures are concerned, as was authorized at the beginning.

My judgment is that this bureau ought to be wiped out of existence. I believe we never can have any reform or any honest government in this country until the whole civil-service fraud—because it is a fraud as it has been practiced before, and it is a fraud as it is practiced now—is wiped out of existence. [Applause.] I make a point of order against it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, just what is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was just going to ascertain. Is the point of order directed against the whole paragraph or merely against the proviso?

Mr. MOON. The point of order is directed against the appropriation of $110,000 and against the proviso, but mainly to the proviso.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly it is not good as to the $110,000; and the proviso, Mr. Chairman, is simply a form of limitation upon the appropriation.

Mr. MOON. The proviso fixes a salary at $1,000 greater than it was before.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The statute does not fix any salary whatever, and the proviso is simply a limitation upon the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has before him the act by which this Bureau of Efficiency was established as an independent entity. The appropriation for this bureau is a lump-sum appropriation. That being so, it is perfectly competent for the House to appropriate any amount it chooses for its operations. It may appropriate one amount this year, and increase or reduce that amount next year. In other words, the amount of the appropriation is entirely in the discretion of the House. Looking to the proviso, it will be noted that the effort is made to fix directly the compensation of the head of the Efficiency Bureau. The proviso declares in terms that the compensation of this head is fixed at the rate of $5,000 per annum. Hence the proviso limits the discretion of the bureau to fix salaries. A limitation or curtailment of the power of discretion, is certainly a change of law. It seems to me that the point of order with respect to the proviso is good, but not good as to the amount of the appropriation. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For commissioner, acting as president of the commission, $5,000; two commissioners, at $5,000 each; chief examiner, $3,500; secretary, $2,500; assistant chief examiner, $2,250; three chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; examiners—1, $2,400, 3 at $2,000 each, 6 at $1,800 each; clerks—6 of class 4, 28 of class 3, 39 of class 2, 52 of class 1, 34 at $1,000 each, 22 at $900 each; messenger; assistant messenger; skilled laborer, $720; 4 mesenger boys, at $420 each. Custodian force: Engineer, $840; general mechanic, $840; telephone-switchboard operator; 2 firemen; 2 watchmen; 2 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 3 laborers; 4 charwomen; in all, $288,470.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, is that the end of that section or not? Is that the end of the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the end of the paragraph.

Mr. MOON. Then it is time to make a point of order upon it. I make the point of order that there is legislation here increasing the salaries of the commissioners, which is out of order on this bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman reserve it for a moment until I can make an explanation?

Mr. MOON. Inasmuch as it is my good friend from Tennessee, I will reserve it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but I do think an explanation is due as to why the committee saw fit to increase the salaries of the three Civil Service Commissioners. For a number of years estimates have been submitted to the committee asking for a salary of $7,500 for these three commissioners.

Those salaries were fixed when the law was passed back in 1880 or 1883, and at that time the salary of $4,500 was fixed for the chairman of the commission and $4,000 each for the other two commissioners. The salary has not been changed since the organic act was passed. For a number of years estimates have been submitted asking that these salaries be increased to $7,500. The point has been made that the members of the Federal Reserve Board get $10,000, that the Farm Loan Commissioners get $10,000, that the Federal Trade Commissioners get $10,000, that the members of the Tariff Commission get $7,500, that the Canadian Boundary Commissioners receive $7,500 each, and other commissioners that I could name, all created recently by Congress, have been given salaries of $7,500 or more.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Were all these salaries fixed before the country was in war?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; they were fixed within the last few years.

Mr. HELM. Does the gentleman think it is good policy on the part of Congress to increase every branch of United States salaries while we are in war?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think so; and if the gentleman will examine the estimates upon which this bill is based he will find any number of requests for increases, and that the committee has declined to accede to those requests except in a very limited number, three or four, and only in those cases because the committee thought they were abundantly justified.

Mr. HELM. The committee cites these other cases in justification for this proposed increase. If this increase of salaries continues to go on, we will find ourselves embarrassed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman misunderstood entirely what I was trying to do. I was simply stating the reason advanced for these commissioners in support of the estimates for an increased salary.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In just a moment. Let me complete the statement. The committee has declined during these years to increase the salaries, but the committee has felt that on account of the fact that the work of the Civil Service Commission has increased 300 per cent within the year, as is shown by their records of the number of papers examined and the civil-service positions newly created, it was only fair to these gentlemen to give them, not the increase asked for, but the small increase allowed in this bill.

Now, I may say that these same estimates provided for an increase for the chief examiner and for the secretary of the commission, both most efficient gentlemen, and had we not been engaged in war I think the committee would have looked with some degree of favor upon those estimates also. But the committee limited the increase to these three commissioners.

Now, I want to say just another word in reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN]. He stated that he believed that the salaries of clerks should be increased, and that he was opposed to these increases of high salaries. I am in thorough accord with the gentleman, and my whole conduct and record here has been in line with that idea. But the gentleman from Missouri certainly spoke without information when he assumed that the clerks in the city of Washington have not received increases. I hold in my hand a statement showing that of the entire number of Government employees during the calendar year ending December 31, 1917, 46.1 per cent received increases averaging $145 a year. There is no department in Washington in which salaries have not been increased for at least 26.1 per cent of the entire force, and in one department the increase has been as high as 131 per cent of the force during the calendar year of 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have an additional minute. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. What is the salary now of the president or chairman of the commission?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Four thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. MOON. And the salary of the other two?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Four thousand dollars.

Mr. MOON. Is it not a fact that the president of the commission gets $4,000, another commissioner gets $4,500, and another one $4,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; the chairman of the commission under the statute gets $4,500 and the other two $4,000.

Mr. MOON. I am informed that one commissioner is getting $500 more than the other, and that member is not the chairman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have no information of that kind.

Mr. MOON. I have been informed by a reliable gentleman that that is the fact.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say that I have not the slightest information about that matter.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order directed to the salary of the three commissioners?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] whether these salaries are fixed by law.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And whether these salaries are in excess of those fixed by law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I concede that it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: To insert in place of the first figures "5,000," on page 31, line 9, the figures "4,500," and after the word "at," in the same line, in place of the figures "5,000" insert "4,000."

Mr. MOON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether any other salaries have been increased under this section?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They have not, but there were a great many requests for increase, which the committee consistently denied.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk calls my attention to the fact that I was in error when I stated that there were no other increase of salaries in this section. I do not want to misinform the gentleman from Tennessee. There are four messenger boys carried in line 16 who were getting $360, and the committee increased the salary of these four from $360 to $420.

Mr. MOON. I think that is a proper increase. I wish it had been put at $500.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional employees for the Civil Service Commission, $150,000: Provided, That not more than two persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,400 per annum.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the proviso. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if I am right in my idea of the meaning of this provision:

Provided, That not more than two persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,400 per annum.

The other employees besides the two may be paid any amount of salary that those in authority may wish to give them?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; quite to the contrary. That limitation provides that the other employees shall receive not exceeding $1,400.

Mr. KEARNS. What do these two persons get?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. One receives $1,600 and the other about $1,800. They are paid out of a lump sum furnished by the President, amounting to $240,000. They were put in the service at this salary, and the committee felt that it was hardly warranted in reducing the amount being paid them out of the lump sum.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Would it not be proper and to be preferred to have the rates of compensation fixed, instead of leaving them entirely to the discretion of the high officers whose duty it is to employ the men and fix their salaries?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As evidence of the spirit of economy that has actuated the commission, I want to say that they were granted a lump sum of $20,000 under the deficiency act of last year. The President, under the necessities of the service, gave them $240,000 out of his emergency fund, which made $260,000 with no strings attached to it. Yet this Civil Service Commission has obligated all of it in the employment of the required force, and have only given two salaries equal to the $1,600 and $1,800. The rest of the force draw $1,400 and less.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The answer of the gentleman justifies the objection to this language. I do not think that $240,000 should be turned over in a lump sum to be used by any bureau without any restrictions whatever.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That was done by the President and not by Congress.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It furnishes a better illustration of the need of limitation on the authority of the heads of bureaus than had occurred to me when I rose.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will look further along he will find that there is $10,000,000 turned over without any strings to it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. There may be activities concerning which we can make no restrictions, but where we can we ought to make them. I am a member of the committee that has to do with one department of the Government. The committee prepares an appropriation bill, and, among its many provisions, the bill carries lump-sum appropriations for different bureaus. I have some knowledge of how lump-sum appropriations are used, and I feel that sometimes they are used different from the expectation of the committee when the authority was given. It seems to me that it is not a proper way to make appropriations—to leave the head of a bureau absolutely without limit as to the manner in which he can use $150,000. For that reason I make the point of order, trusting that the chairman of this committee will suggest better language.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think it is well for the committee to understand what the effect of the point of order of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] would be.

The language now restricts the expenditure of the $150,000 to salaries that shall not be greater than $1,400, except as to two.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman what the amount of those two salaries is?

Mr. SHERLEY. Just a moment. The result of the point of order would be to leave the $150,000 to be paid to any number at any rate of salary, no matter how high. The result of the point of order would be to take off the restriction and to give unlimited power. The result of the point of order would be to let down all of the bars that are thrown around expenditures and invite the abuse that the gentleman complains of. I say this in order that the gentleman from Michigan, in making his point of order, may know the effect of it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand perfectly the effect of the point of order, but I think the gentleman from Michigan on reflection will desire to withdraw it, because I believe it will accomplish the purpose that he does not desire to accomplish. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky this: I presume the reason that the lump-sum appropriation has been continued is that it is supposed that this will be more or less temporary. Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not only that, but there is another reason. The reason is for the protection of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am not speaking of the proviso, but of the lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. So am I; and I want to explain, because it raises a very important and a very interesting proposition. The reason why the committee saw fit to continue sums for additional employees, without specifying those employees and arranging them in classes, was for the purpose of making them only temporary employees, whereas if you increase all of your personnel by feeding into it these additional employees now needed you would find that at the end of the war, when the need had passed, all of your statutory rolls would be increased manyfold, in some departments three and four hundred and a thousand fold, and the difficulty of ever separating those people from the rolls and reducing your salary list to the normal condition would be infinitely greater than if we carry them in these lump-sum appropriations and check, as the committee has endeavored to do in each instance, the expenditure of money.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I had supposed that was the reason. That is to say, it is regarded as temporary; it is not thought that at the conclusion of the war the number of employees now required will then be required?

Mr. SHERLEY. Exactly so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And to make it thoroughly easy to dispense with the services of those, it is not deemed desirable to place them upon the roll individually?

Mr. SHERLEY. As permanent employees; and it is really for the protection of the Treasury of the United States. Any other system will result in adding manyfold to the expense of the Government in the days that are to come.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what the gentleman has in mind, but I do not believe that he will find in the entire bill a lump-sum appropriation which has been treated with that same consideration to save for the Government as has been the case with the Civil Service Commission. The chairman of the commission, regarding this expenditure, said:

> Most of these clerks are employed at $900, $1,000, $1,200; a very few—three or four, possibly—at $1,400; one at $1,800. This $1,800 man was a man who had gone out because of illness and his place had been filled by promotion, and he was brought back again.

Further on, as I recall, the other person referred to was receiving a salary of either $1,600 or $1,800. There are no large salaries paid out of this fund at all, and I do not believe the gentleman ought to make the point of order because the committee can not offer an amendment designating the number of clerks of each class that the commission could use under this item. I think a great deal of money will be saved by making a lump-sum appropriation in this case and by leaving the language just as the committee incorporated it in the bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Under this lump sum is there any limit to the salary that can be paid? In some of the bureaus there is.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, they can not, except as to two, pay any of them more than $1,400.

Mr. GOOD. And those two are employed now, one at $1,800 and, according to my recollection, the other at $1,600 or $1,800, notwithstanding that under the lump sum given this department this commission could have paid as high as it wished in the exercise of its discretion. They have not abused the appropriation in the slightest, for out of this large lump-sum appropriated for clerk hire only two persons have been paid salaries of $1,800 or over per annum.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be some limit placed on the discretion of the salary-fixing authority? Could not some limit be placed?

Mr. GOOD. There is a limit. He can not pay a salary in excess of $1,400, with the exception of two persons.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Then, as to those two should there not be some limit?

Mr. GOOD. The committee did not feel, in view of the fact this commission had not abused its right and had only paid salaries to the extent of $1,800, that it was necessary to put a limitation on those two.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And with the further assurance on the part of the commissioners that they did not intend to increase those salaries.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. In considering the merits of the proviso in limiting the discretion of the commission in the use of the $150,000 lump-sum appropriation, whereby they can not use it in the employment of any officials except two having a salary in excess of $1,400, will the gentleman also consider that the provisio is not subject to the point of order, because its limitation is within the precedents and does not come within the rule that forbids legislation on an appropriation bill?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Well, I made the point of order with the idea it was good, and it is up to the Chair to determine whether or not it is good.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, if the point of order of the gentleman is sustained it leaves absolutely no limitation upon the lump sum.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I realized when I made the point of order if it was sustained it would leave the expenditure of the $150,000 without any limitation or restriction whatever, but I believed, of course, when that situation confronted the House it would be taken care of. I know also that if the proviso is stricken out something further must be done with the paragraph. Now, I have had some experience in seeing how lump-sum appropriations are employed and how the use of lump-sum funds has been abused. I will say also, in my judgment, no small part of the ill feeling among employees of a bureau as to salaries grows out of abuse of discretion by the chief, salaries being increased some times beyond the merit of those who receive the increases; whenever that is done there is dissatisfaction and ill feeling and demand all along the line for increase of salaries. I have known that to be the case, and, as I say, no small part of the trouble and the demands for increases, sometimes justly and sometimes otherwise, are due to the fact that lump-sum funds have not been used with good judgment by those in authority.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would it be satisfactory to the gentleman if we add after the word "provided" the words "and not higher than $1,800"? Would that meet the objections of the gentleman?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have those words written as an amendment to be offered if my point of order is not sustained.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman let me ask him something?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman suggests that if the point of order is sustained, then he expects the House to be able to remedy the situation. Will the gentleman inform the committee—the Committee on Appropriations, at least—if no legislation, even to safeguard the Treasury, is to be permitted on the bill, how, after the limitation is stricken out which does safeguard the Treasury, we can then turn around and by legislation protect the Treasury?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the chairman of the committee and those having charge should refuse to have anything further to do with the provision simply because it was amended against their wishes, the situation which the gentleman from Kentucky points out would arise.

Mr. SHERLEY. We have had two statements made here to-day, more than two, that nothing that was in the form of legislation, irrespective of merit, should be on these bills.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order with the hope that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin will be presented and adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman withdraws the point of order on the assumption that an amendment would be offered, I feel it is my duty to offer the amendment, and so I move to amend the paragraph by adding, after the last word, the words "and not higher than $1,800."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk tells me that one of these employees gets $1,890.

Mr. STAFFORD. In view of the statement of the chairman of the committee that one clerk is now employed at a salary of $1,890, I wish to modify the amendment so as to make it $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the modification suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin will be agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let the amendment be reported as modified.

Mr. McKENZIE. Let me ask the gentleman whether or not under that amendment it would not be possible to pay all persons appointed under this $2,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They could only pay two.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read for the information of the committee the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 24, after the word "annum," strike out the period and insert the words "and not higher than $2,000."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I submit that this provision is absolutely safeguarded. It provides that not more than two shall receive $1,400. Now, the commissioners stated to the committee that one was receiving $1,890, which allows the 5 per cent increase, and the other gets $1,600, as I stated a moment ago. Now, Mr. Chairman, the commissioners stated in the hearings to the committee that they did not propose to increase the salaries of those two clerks, and that none of the other clerks were getting more than $1,400. From the very fact that they had $260,000 in a lump sum and have not abused their discretion, but have employed only two people at more than $1,400, I think is a guaranty to this House that they are not going to abuse their discretion in the case of these two employees. These gentlemen are anxious to serve the public interest in every way possible.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman knows I was in entire sympathy with the provision as reported by the committee, and having made a suggestion to the gentleman, and he having withdrawn the point of order relying upon the suggestion that the amendment would be offered, I offered it in good faith to carry out the purpose and understanding with the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I have not made this objection because I feel that the salaries paid are too high. All I have had to do with the fixing of salaries bears out the statement that I am not particular about salaries. I wish them to be sufficient. I have voted for every increase within reason, I believe, that has been suggested in the committee of which I am a member. I have labored to the extent of my ability to further legislation looking to general increases of these lower salaries. I do not care whether these two are paid $1,600, $1,800, $2,000, or $2,500 if the work they do justifies such salaries as that. But I was calling attention to the latitude that is allowed the head of the bureau to pay any salary he pleases. I know that discretion exercised in some cases has not worked well, and as far as I am able I would take away that discretion and have a definite salary paid and have the amount right. I think if the words "and no salary paid hereunder shall be in excess of $2,000," if that is proper, would be in better form than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and I therefore move to amend by substituting those words, namely, "and that no salary paid hereunder shall exceed $2,000." Only two shall be paid $1,400 and none shall be paid over $2,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want the amendment reported, and then I want to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan: Page 31, line 24, after the word "annum," strike out the period and insert the words: "and no salary paid hereunder shall exceed $2,000."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope that both the amendment to the amendment and the amendment may be defeated, and I hope that they may be defeated in the interest of good administration. If we were voting a huge sum, without any limitation, to this commission, and if there had been anything in its past history that warranted the belief that there were going to be extravagant salaries paid, I should be in favor of one or two courses, either restricting the salaries that could be paid or the removal of those commissioners and putting efficient administrators in their place. But the fact remains that the only leeway given at all is that they may employ two employees at a salary in excess of $1,400. If they are fit for their jobs at all, they are fit to have that much responsibility placed in them.

I took occasion the other day in presenting the deficiency bill to call the attention of the House to the fact that many of our attempts—attempts that come all of a sudden, and come up frequently because some one has had some complaint from some employee in some department touching his salary against somebody else's—resulted in tying the hands of good men and simply giving to the bad officials an opportunity to exercise their ingenuity in evading such limitations, which they speedily proceed to do.

Now, we ought not to encumber this bill with undue restrictions. It may be very likely that there will develop some work in connection with this special fund at this time, when this Civil Service Commission has had its work increased many, many fold, whereby they may need to employ some one at a greater compensation than $2,000. They would be unable to do it with this provision. If you are going on the theory that these men can not be trusted at all, then you ought to strike out this paragraph. Otherwise, you ought not to tie them within such narrow lines that there is no flexibility. Now, there is not a business man in the world that could run his business successfully and economically with the restrictions and the wrapping of red tape that we place around these bureaus. And the same Congress that inveighs against red tape in one breath in the next breath insists on winding its own particular brand of red tape around administrative officers.

I hope that the two amendments will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

No detail of clerks or other employees from the executive departments or other Government establishments in Washington, D. C., to the Civil Service Commission, for the performance of duty in the District of Columbia, shall be made for or during the fiscal year 1919. The Civil Service Commission shall, however, have power in case of emergency to transfer or detail any of its employees herein provided for to or from its office force, field force, or rural carrier examining board.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, on page 32, line 12, I move to strike out the word "Washington" and insert the word "the."

I have no doubt the committee will agree to the proposed amendment, but a few words of explanation might not be out of place. Throughout the bill, where the seat of government is intended to be used, sometimes "the city of Washington" is used and sometimes "the District of Columbia," and sometimes "the city of Washington in the District of Columbia." There ought to be uniformity about it, particularly since the use of the language, as it appears in the bill in many places, apparently at least, gives recognition to a historical condition which does not exist. There are peculiarities about the charter which was granted to the city of Washington, and to its repeal finally, to which I called attention last summer in some remarks. After I had done so the President of the United States changed the manner of concluding his proclamations. Theretofore the proclamations of all Presidents had concluded by saying "Done at the city of Washington." Since then President Wilson concludes his proclamations by saying "Done in the District of Columbia." I sent a copy of those remarks to the distinguished gentleman who edits the Star. He wrote me a letter acknowledging receipt of it, and saying that he, too, was entirely satisfied that the seat of government was the District of Columbia. Strange to say, in 1802, when the city of Washington was first chartered, there were no limits fixed for the municipal corporation. It just simply incorporated the city of Washington, without even saying it was in the District of Columbia, and no limit was fixed to the boundary of the corporation. It had been commonly accepted that Florida Avenue was the northern boundary of it, that the Eastern Branch of the river was another boundary, and that the Potomac River was another boundary. But that is not true.

No boundary whatever, as I stated, was ever fixed for the city of Washington when it was incorporated as a municipality. By the act of February 21, 1871, the charter of the city of Washington was repealed entirely. But the Constitution of the United States fixes the District of Columbia as the seat of government. The act of July 16, 1790, provides for the acquirement of the District of Columbia, and that act also makes the District of Columbia as the seat of government.

In 1790 the capital was in New York, and a compromise was made at that time by permitting the capital to go to Philadelphia for the next 10 years, and then to be removed to the District of Columbia in December, 1800.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. KEARNS. Is what we call "Georgetown" here part of the seat of government?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Georgetown, if I remember correctly, was incorporated under the British Crown in 1750, and when the District of Columbia was established it took in the city of Georgetown. Until the act of February 21, 1871, the city of Georgetown was a separate municipality, and by that act its corporate existence was repealed.

Mr. KEARNS. It is now known as part of Washington City, is it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is part of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KEARNS. Is it not a part of Washington City?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is not a part of Washington City, because there is no "city of Washington."

Mr. KEARNS. Then "where are we at"? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I appreciate the fact that the amendment that I have just offered does not in any wise affect the bill, and I am making it only for the purpose of inviting the attention of the committee to it, so that next year, when the bill comes to be made up again, it may be made up using the words "District of Columbia" advisedly and not inadvisedly using "the city of Washington" in lieu of "the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: Page 32, line 12, strike out the word "Washington" and insert the word "the," so that it will read "Government establishments in the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the two commas, the one in from of "District of Columbia" and the one after, be also taken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment suggested by the gentleman is agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KEARNS. I do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] a question. The gentleman from Kentucky has just made a statement that there is no such thing as "the city of Washington."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman's speech has been rather interesting, and I would like——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will state that I made some extended remarks on that subject last summer which are in print, and if the gentleman desires I will send him a copy of them, or any other gentleman who desires to have them.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, on the last two votes in the House on the Senate bill 383 yesterday I was unavoidably detained from the House. Had I been present I would have voted for the Lunn amendment and for the bill on its final passage.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

For Secretary of State, $12,000; Assistant Secretary, $5,000; Second and Third Assistant Secretaries, at $4,500 each; Director of the Consular Service, $4,500; counselor for the department, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $7,500; officers to aid in important drafting work—four at $4,500 each, four at $3,000 each, to be appointed by the Secretary, any one of whom may be employed as chief of division of far eastern, Latin American, near eastern, or European affairs, or upon other work in connection with foreign relations; three assistant solicitors of the department, to be appointed by the Secretary, at $3,000 each; chief clerk, who shall sign such official papers and documents as the Secretary may direct, $3,000; law clerk, $2,500; law clerk and assistant, to be selected and appointed by the Secretary to edit the laws of Congress and perform such other duties as may be required of them, at $2,500 and $1,500, respectively; chiefs of bureaus—two at $2,250 each, five at $2,100 each; two translators, at $2,100 each; additional to chief of Bureau of Accounts as disbursing clerk, $200; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,500; clerk to the Secretary, $1,800; clerks—17 of class 4, 19 of class 3, 25 of class 2, 43 of class 1 (3 of whom shall be telegraph operators), 18 at $1,000 each, 18 at $900 each; chief messenger, $1,000; 6 messengers; 23 assistant messengers; 2 messenger boys at $420 each; packer, $720; 4 laborers; 2 telephone switchboard operators; chauffeur, $1,080; in all, $321,320.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee about the language in line 9 of page 33, "to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." Is there any real necessity for that language being carried in the bill? That is a permanent place, is it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is a permanent place; but, of course, Congress could abolish it at any time it chooses.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; just as it could abolish the Third Assistant Secretary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is no law, I will say to the gentleman, stipulating that he shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is no law for that except that it is carried in an appropriation bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Only as it is carried in the appropriation bill; but, of course, the gentleman will understand that under the statute which was passed March 4, 1915, the salary carried in that bill was permanently fixed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course I understand that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But there is no law providing for the manner in which this counselor shall be appointed except as carried in the appropriation bill from year to year.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the act provide for the appointment of a counselor?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It does.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does that make it a permanent position?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. That act reads as follows—section 6 of the act:

The officers and employees of the United States whose salaries are herein appropriated for or established shall continue from year to year to the extent that they shall be appropriated for by Congress.

Now, I submit that there might be some question as to the manner in which they should be appointed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the chief clerk and superintendent: Chief clerk, including $300 as superintendent of Treasury Building, who shall be the chief executive officer of the department and who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to sign official papers and documents during the temporary absence of the Secretary and the Assistant Secretaries of the department, $4,000; assistant superintendent of Treasury Building, $2,500; administrative clerk, $2,000; clerks—1 $2,000, 4 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 3 of class 2, 3 of class 1, 1 $1,000, 1 $900; operator of photographic copying machine, $800; 2 messengers; 3 assistant messengers; mimeograph operator, $720; messenger boy, $420; storekeeper, $1,200; telegraphers—1 $1,400, 1 $1,200; telephone and telegraph operator, $1,200; 3 telephone switchboard operators; chief engineer, $1,400; 3 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; 8 elevator conductors, at $720 each, and the use of laborers as relief elevator conductors during rush hours is authorized; 8 firemen; coal passer, $600; locksmith and electrician, $1,400; captain of the watch, $1,400; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $900 each; 65 watchmen; foreman of laborers, $1,200; 7 chauffeurs, at $720 each; and the transfer to said positions of six laborers from the rolls of the chief clerk's office is hereby authorized independently of the civil-service rules; skilled laborers—2 at $840 each, 2 at $720 each; 2 electricians, at $1,200 each; wireman, $900; 45 laborers; plumber, $1,100; painter, $1,100; plumber's assistant, $780; attendant for emergency relief room, $660; 85 charwomen; carpenters—2 at $1,000 each, 1 $720. Winder Building: Engineer, $1,000; 3 firemen; elevator conductor, $720; 4 watchmen; 3 laborers (1 of whom, when necessary, shall assist and relieve the elevator conductor); forewoman of char force, $480; 8 charwomen. Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to ask the chairman of the committee about some new items in this paragraph. I see an Assistant Secretary, two additional Secretaries, page 33, at $5,000 each. What is the occasion for increasing that force?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are authorized by law. The gentleman will remember—and, by the way, that is the preceding paragraph——

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it is.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will remember that under the act of 1917 two additional Assistant Secretaries were provided for in the Treasury Department.

Mr. HAMLIN. Are these those that were provided for?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Here is an administration clerk at $2,000, on top of page 37. What is the necessity of that clerk?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is a new place. That clerk has charge of requisitions and supplies. The chief clerk of the Treasury Department made this statement to the committee: He said that when these requisitions came into his office from the various bureaus in the departments, he had no one to make a personal investigation to determine whether or not they ought to be allowed in whole or in part, and he needed some man of administrative ability whom he could send to the bureaus to ascertain the facts. For instance, if a bureau made a request for an additional desk, or a chair, or a typewriter, or any other supply, he wanted a man he could send to the bureau to make a personal investigation as to the need of it.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the man does his whole duty he will earn his money.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee thought so.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is true, and I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of War-Risk Insurance: For expenses of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, authorized by the act approved October 6, 1917, and prior acts, as follows: For salaries of the director and commissioners, and of such deputies, assistants, accountants, experts, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, $3,000,000; rental of quarters, $140,000; stationery and miscellaneous expenses, including not exceeding $100 for law books and books of reference and subscriptions to periodicals, and not exceeding $150 for street car tickets, $60,000; printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office and necessary printing of forms, etc., for use abroad may be done abroad, $200,000; furniture, equipment, and supplies, $150,000; traveling expenses, including not exceeding $4 per diem in lieu of subsistence, $40,000; purchase, maintenance, and repair of a motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicle, $1,000; in all, $3,591,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the measure a question. Has the gentleman any information as to the salaries that are paid the experts that will be paid out of the $3,000,000 lump-sum appropriation, and what kind of experts are they going to employ?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will look at the hearings on page 187, he will find a complete list of the salaries provided for in this bill.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that the experts apparently are employed as insurance experts, except experts in the nature of legal assistants. Do I understand that this table that is set forth in the hearings represent the salaries that have been fixed by somebody else and which are to be paid to these gentlemen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; they were fixed by the director, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. I think the director and the commissioner and members of the advisory board were the only salaries fixed in the act.

Mr. WALSH. Are any of these people under the classified civil service?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand all the clerical positions in the War-Risk Bureau are being filled through the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. WALSH. Under this provision they need not be.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not want to be understood as saying that all of these positions have been filled through the civil service, particularly those so-called experts to which the gentleman refers. I understand they have been appointed without the civil service.

Mr. WALSH. The only class that has been within the civil service are the clerks?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think that all of them were originally appointed under civil service, because the gentleman will remember that during a number of months—since the war began—the Civil Service Commission was unable to furnish a sufficient eligible list, and authority was given to various bureaus to make appointments temporarily pending the examination. The gentleman will find, if he will examine the act, that section 17 provides that, with the exception of the director, the commissioners, and such special experts as the Secretary may from time to time find necessary for the conduct of the war, all of the employees shall be appointed from such eligibles supplied by the Civil Service Commission in accordance with the civil-service law. As I stated, I think it is entirely possible that there were clerks appointed temporarily, in the beginning of the organization of the bureau, with the understanding that they would subsequently take the civil-service examination and stand or fall thereby.

Mr. GILLETT. But it would not be a competitive examination, would it? They would have to pass a class examination.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman may be correct in that; at any rate, they were required to stand the examination prescribed by law.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact that these positions have been filled from the list made up by the Civil Service Commission from the applications that have been filed, and that the applicants have been rated upon the experience and qualifications which they set forth in their application blanks, and that they did not have to assemble anywhere and take the civil-service examination?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; all these clerks placed here had a civil-service examination.

Mr. WALSH. A competitive examination?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not certain that it has been competitive in the sense that the gentleman uses the term. They have been required to stand the regular civil-service examination provided for clerks.

Mr. WALSH. That may be true concerning this bureau, but I think the custom is for the applicant to file an application, in which he is required to set forth his experience and his qualifications and his education, and he is rated by the commission upon the facts stated in the application; that they do not have to assemble at any point and proceed to answer the questions upon examination.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I know that is true as applied to certain positions, but I never heard that that practice was followed with reference to clerical positions.

Mr. HAMLIN. Right on that point I may be able to give the gentleman a little information. I know of some clerks who have gone into this particular bureau who took the regular competitive civil-service examination.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. And they were appointed on their examination. I do not know whether all of them have been or not, but I know that appointments are being made through the Civil Service Commission from those who have stood the competitive examination.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My statement as to the possibility of clerks being appointed temporarily pending the examinations applied only to the appointments made when this bureau was first organized.

Mr. HAMLIN. I know that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the gentleman is entirely correct in his statement that competitive examinations are now being held.

Mr. HAMLIN. And they are appointed in that way now.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. The fact is that in the organization of this bureau, as in many other additional activities thrown upon this Government by reason of our entry into the war, the Civil Service Commission were without a list of eligibles to fill the positions. It was necessary, therefore, to fill them with temporary employees. Those temporary employees were given tentative employment, subject to the subsequent examination which would show them to be qualified for those positions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts have five minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly at the present time, and for some time past, the Civil Service Commission has been in a position to furnish all the additional help from the civil-service rolls, and the War-Risk Bureau is not employing any temporary employees at the present time, but is employing those selected from the civil-service register to supply the additional employees needed from time to time as our Army is increased, imposing greater burdens upon that bureau.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will permit me, I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit that?

Mr. WALSH. I will permit it.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin understands the situation fairly well, and therefore I want to ask him what is the ability of the War-Risk Insurance organization to take care of the cases that come before it, with reference to expedition? I have an immense amount of correspondence as a result of the delay in the War-Risk Bureau, and I wish to know whether the delay is because of the recent organization, and the lack of clerical help, or whether it is due to failure to file the necessary facts upon which to base the insurance? I have so much correspondence that the obtaining of information sufficient to give definite answers has been an embarrassment.

Mr. STAFFORD. As the gentleman knows, this War-Risk Bureau is only five months old. It was created under the act of October 6 last. It had from the very start a herculean task to perform. As the days went on the work multiplied so enormously that no human agency could keep the work current until sufficient help was obtained, and still more necessary, modern labor-saving devices which would expedite the work of the bureau. The delay has been due in a way not only to the want of help but largely to the need of a system whereby they could plan for and expedite this work. They are devising a plan of utilizing labor-saving machinery whereby they can stamp with one process five or six different pieces of paper or cards, that will serve for five different operations in the allotment of pay and the like. The chief of the bureau, Mr. De Lanoy, came before our subcommittee, as well as before the subcommittee on deficiencies, and I know he impressed me, and I think he impressed other members of our committee very favorably by his statement as to the progress of the work. If the work is not current now, he stated that it would be current in a short time. As with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], so with myself and others, we have been receiving letters which we have submitted to them; yet, so far as the replies to my letters are concerned, the delay has not been unnecessarily long. The chief of the bureau, Mr. De Lanoy, states that replies will be given attention as speedily as possible; but gentlemen must realize that here is not only a great insurance bureau, but a pension bureau, and it has been subject to all the delays incidental to a new organization; but they are getting the machinery together, and in a very short time they will be up with their work and able to give satisfaction, I hope, to those who come under the provisions of this law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me to make this statement in connection with what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] said, I had a letter from the War-Risk Bureau this morning, in which it is said that there are 1,200,000 applications on file.

Mr. WALSH. About $12,000,000,000 worth of insurance.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit another suggestion? I think that a great deal of the trouble and annoyance which they have had comes from the fact that the soldiers do not understand that they must make application for the allotment of this pension, and therefore the Government can not take up and consider that part of it. That seems to be the trouble in my section.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] have five minutes more. I do not think he has had any part of the last five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman for securing for me an extension of time. There are one or two other questions I should like to ask in connection with this item. I notice that apparently the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized under this item to employ these various experts, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, and that when the director was before the committee he stated that they had not given very much consideration to the matter of establishing branch offices with headquarters in the various States, but he conveyed the impression, I think, from a fair reading of his statement, that they intended to have a sort of flying squadron, as he said, which would presumably move about the country and establish headquarters temporarily at different places. Has the gentleman any further information as to that, other than what is contained in the hearings?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that, of course, these applications which come from soldiers are based, some of them, on the fact that they have a wife, others that they have so many children, others that they have dependent mothers, fathers, brothers, or sisters, and it is necessary to have some one make a personal investigation in order to determine whether or not the facts stated are true. It was stated by the director that there were cases where the soldier had been married three or four times, and those matters have to be investigated. They can not be investigated in camp, and it is the idea of the director, as I understand, to appoint a State agent and to have whatever force may be necessary in the various States to make these investigations and determine the accuracy of the applications which are submitted. The gentleman will realize that that is absolutely necessary in order to protect the Treasury and to see that justice is done in every case.

Mr. WALSH. I realize that, of course, but I also appreciate how easy it is to build up a great organization with branch offices in the various States, with different officials that would in many respects resemble the various pension bureaus or offices that were abolished some years ago. I believe that if there is any such intention as that in this large appropriation it ought to be carefully guarded. I do not think we ought to permit this very important and valuable bureau of the Government to become top-heavy, because I think that when it gets on a proper footing it can be administered economically and efficiently in the city of Washington. If it is not, it certainly will not be for lack of room for quarters.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that it was called to the attention of the director that it would be inadvisable to establish extensive branch offices in the various States, and that there was really no necessity for the establishment of such offices. The gentleman will remember that a number of years ago we had pension agencies in the various States, and Congress subsequently discontinued them and brought the forces in charge to the Pension Office here. Those things were brought to the attention of the Director of the War-Risk Bureau, and he stated that he had no intention of building up any such organization; but he did say that it would be necessary to have some one in the various States who could make the investigations to which I have referred. He said his bureau was in a state of formation; that it was impossible for him to indicate or to know just what would be necessary and just what he would have to do in order to have these investigations conducted, but he assured the committee that it was not his intention to build up any great organization in any State. I may say to the gentleman that I was personally, and I think the whole committee was, very much impressed with the Director of the War-Risk Bureau. He is a business man of excellent ability and has a very clear and a very high conception of the obligations which rest upon him. The director and the commissioner are men of a high order of ability. They are exceedingly efficient and are building up a very efficient organization.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman realizes how easy it is for that sort of thing to become fixed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I appreciate that.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman a little about the furniture. Does the gentleman know anything about the method followed in purchasing furniture, either for this department or which will be purchased——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TOWNER: Page 41, line 21, after the figures "$3,591,000," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following words:

"Provided, That all clerks and employees hereafter to be appointed in this bureau shall be from the classified service."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. TOWNER. That may be true; but I ask the gentleman to reserve it.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall reserve it for a few minutes; yes. If the gentleman is going to make a long talk, I shall not.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee. Much of the matter referred to in this proviso has already been discussed and explained by the chairman of the committee. The appointments that have been made so far, as I understand, outside of the classified service, have been temporary appointments?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In so far as the clerical force of the bureau is concerned.

Mr. TOWNER. That is what I understood. It is the intention, I understand, that hereafter appointments shall be made from the classified service?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Exactly.

Mr. TOWNER. In accordance with the language of the act?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. TOWNER. Of course, knowing as many of us do that appointments have been made outside of the classified service, notwithstanding the provisions of the act, it is a source of some curiosity to us to know why that has been done.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon me there?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to read to the gentleman a short statement from Mr. De Lanoy, right on that point. Mr. De Lanoy, as the gentleman knows, is the director of this bureau. He was asked about the employees:

> Mr. GOOD. What about the other employees?
> Mr. DE LANOY. They are all civil-service employees, sir, following the law. We obtained permission from the Civil Service Commission in the great rush and pressure that we were under not long ago, to take on temporaries, as they call them; stenographers and typewriters, with a proviso that they must pass an examination within 60 or 90 days, and then if they did not measure up to the proper standard, they would have to go. That tided us over. The Civil Service Commission was unable to supply these employees from the rolls.

The chairman of the Civil Service Commission also made a similar statement.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the explanation is satisfactory and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. I notice in the hearings in the statement of the persons employed by the bureau a large number of men drawing $2,000, $2,400, $2,500, $3,000, and $4,000.

The director of the bureau announced in the beginning of the organization that with the exception of the members of the advisory board, the commissioners, deputy commissioner, and men of that character, there would not be any places for the employment of extraordinary men above $1,800. Can the gentleman explain, or did the director explain to the committee, why he was forced to pay $2,000 and $2,500 and $3,000 for those men?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say that the director stated that it was impossible to secure insurance experts, men possessing knowledge——

Mr. WINGO. But I am not talking about experts. The gentleman did not catch my question. Take, for instance, the assistant chief clerk. He does not have to be an insurance expert. Take the superintendent of mails and files, chief of supplies, chief of information, chief of the stenographic section, and men like that. I had in mind a very high-class man who was offered an $1,800 position because he was informed that was the limit and no one could be appointed above that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, the gentleman will note that there are very few who are paid above $2,000.

Mr. WINGO. But the inference was at that time there would be only six or eight drawing more than $1,800 outside of the commissioners themselves, and I was wondering what was the occasion for his having changed his plan in respect to that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will notice that there is——

Mr. WINGO. I will give the gentleman a concrete case: There is a man drawing $2,500 in his present position who was perfectly willing and anxious to go into this service. He is an expert in particular lines of work and who could fill about two-thirds of the positions that are designated in the first list on page 187 of the hearings. He was told that they were limited to $1,800 for this class of men. Subsequently he picked up a man of less ability, and that man was put on at over $2,000, while this man of extraordinary experience was rejected because he was not permitted to pay him over $1,800 under his organization scheme.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The bureau is not limited, I will say to the gentleman, in the amount he shall pay for these experts. The gentleman will notice there are only about 29 or 30 who are paid exceeding $1,800——

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I think when you consider the fact that this represents a force of 2,900 employees——

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman misunderstands me.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That it makes a good showing.

Mr. WINGO. I agree that they ought to pay them the salaries. I took the position at the time they ought to pay men of that type more than $1,800 or you could not get them. In this short time I could not discuss that, but at some subsequent time I am going to get about 30 minutes and give concrete facts and statements and put in the RECORD certain information with reference to the matter.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to call the attention of the gentleman——

Mr. WINGO. I was just trying to ascertain why it was that finally they changed their plan. Was it a necessity in order to get men of this type?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, of course, I can not inform the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask that the gentleman have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I take it that when he could not employ this friend, who was urged by the gentleman, at a salary exceeding $1,800 that at the time he felt that he could not do so——

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman misunderstands me. He did employ men at a larger salary than $1,800.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say this to the gentleman: That the director of that bureau has built up this great organization—which will ultimately consist of 2,900 employees—and that the average salary is only $1,080.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman misunderstands me.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. So the director has been remarkably economical. I may say also that he has not been actuated or controlled by political influence. He has a most efficient organization, although some no doubt have been disappointed at not securing positions.

Mr. WINGO. I am not complaining about his paying too high salaries——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Another thing; this bureau in itself has more employees than some of the departments, and a salary of $2,500 to an assistant chief clerk is not an unusual salary.

Mr. WINGO. I am not objecting to it. I say I think he ought to have it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman referred to it, and I do not think it is subject to criticism.

Mr. WINGO. At the time this organization came into being I thought that the chief of the stenographic section should have a salary of $2,400. I see he is given $2,000. I thought that the salary of the assistant disbursing clerk should be $2,400. I now see he is given $2,250. As to the man who is chief of information I thought at the time that they could not get a competent man for less than $2,400. It is now $2,250. Yet they turn down a man who applied for one of these positions, because they said they could not pay more than $1,800. I am glad that he saw finally he had to pay proper salaries in order to get men qualified to do the work of this character; indeed, I am sorry he did not ascertain it sooner so as to prevent some of the delays from which we are now suffering.

The man I have in mind was one whose ability to fill one of these positions was admitted, and regret expressed that the director was not permitted to pay more than $1,800 for men of this character; yet, subsequently, men of no greater ability, and at least in one instance of less ability, were appointed at salaries ranging from $2,000 to $3,000. Of course, I am aware of the political influence that was responsible for such conduct. At a later date I shall go into detail as to that.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment, and I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. I hope I can have the attention of the chairman of the committee. Some question has been raised here about compensation of experts in the War Risk Insurance Bureau—and let me say I am not antagonizing these appropriations at all, because, as far as I have information, they are meritorious.

I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to say that some item under consideration probably applied to expert insurance men. Now, the question I want to ask is this: What use has the bureau for an expert insurance man? I understand that under the law every soldier is eligible to insurance without medical examination. The amount for which the policy can be written is fixed by law. It can not be less than a specified sum, and in multiples of 500 up to a certain figure, and it can not go beyond that. The rate of premium is fixed and determined, or can be determined by any business man, and the query to my mind is: What use has the bureau for an expert, so called?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that this is a very complicated law.

Mr. RUCKER. It may be that you need an expert to interpret the law, but you do not require the services of an expert insurance man to write those policies.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There are all kinds of allowances made, depending upon this condition and that condition.

Mr. RUCKER. I realize that; but let me ask another question. It is true that that bill, unfortunately, did not come from the gentleman's committee, and he did not have a chance to prepare it, or he would have prepared it well, but do I understand the gentleman to say that the great committee which did report that bill reported such a conglomeration that an expert is needed to interpret it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, no.

Mr. RUCKER. Or is so confused that we have to have experts to tell what Congress did?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, no. I was not criticizing the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. RUCKER. I understand the gentleman did not by direct statement.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure it was drawn as carefully and as clearly as it was possible for it to be drawn, but the gentleman knows that it covers a multitude of subjects.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me say to the gentleman that I am not antagonizing this feature of the bill, but I do insist there ought to be a better reason for these high-priced salaries than to talk about their being experts, because I do not think they have any occasion for experts.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, the gentleman knows, and if he will examine the hearings he will find, that out of this entire force, as I said awhile ago, including the director, including the members of the advisory board, including the commissioners, the actuaries, the chief clerk, and the chief of division; and the experts—only about 30, I think it is—have been employed at a salary exceeding $1,800. Now, I submit to the gentleman that is not a very great number of experts. And the director stated, if the gentleman will pardon me, that he must have experts who have some knowledge of insurance and experience in making settlements, and so forth, and also some who have some legal information. He could not procure men possessing these qualifications for a less sum.

Mr. RUCKER. If the gentleman has concluded, I hope I may use a part of my time.

I said, and I repeat, that I am not criticizing the number of gentlemen who draw $2,000 or $2,500. I am assuming they are worth it, and I believe they are worth it, but it seems to me, in defense of the bill we ought to have a better reason than to say that it is because they are experts, when the particular work to which his attention is directed does not require expert service at all.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I want to ask permission to extend and revise some desultory remarks that I made some time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I have no desire or disposition to indulge in captious criticism of the manner in which appointments have been made since the beginning of the war, particularly to the new and the growing and enlarging bureaus of the Government. I realize that under these circumstances, under the conditions that have existed, it has not been possible at all times to select and to secure all of the help needed from those who have regularly passed civil-service examinations. But I do think that it would be enlightening and helpful to have a little plain talk on the subject of the manner in which appointments have been made.

It is all very well for the gentlemen at the head of these bureaus, which are supposed to be under civil service, to use the language of "camouflage" in their statements as to the way in which appointments have been made. The fact is, the plain, unvarnished fact, that these new bureaus and these enlarging departments have been vitalized as glorified plum trees for the use and benefit of Democratic Representatives and Senators. I do not know of any Republican, I have not heard of any, who has secured these temporary appointments. So far as I am personally concerned, I have not sought any of them, and therefore I have not been disappointed. I am not complaining because of the fact that those appointed have been in the main or probably wholly appointed on recommendation of Democratic Members of the House and Senate. But I think it is just as well for some one to state that fact. There has been a good deal of very polite conversation and discussion here with regard to this matter, which is all very well in its way. The fact remains that there has been no effort—well, I will not say that; I will not say there has not been any effort—to comply with the civil-service rules. I presume there has been an honest effort on the part of some officials and probably some effort on the part of all, but I do not think that many of the men in charge of the War-Risk Bureau, for instance, have made any very special effort to comply with the civil-service law. They have appointed about everybody bearing recognized Democratic credentials, so far as my information goes, and largely young and inexperienced people, who were recommended by the proper folks, bearing indorsement from approved Democratic sources. Let us assume for the purpose of the discussion that that is all right. Let us understand about it, however, and let the country know about it if the country is interested in it.

We on this side have had nothing to do with it, and it has been largely without very much regard to civil service. What I fear—and I have some information on which to found that fear—is that the appointments to a very considerable extent have not been with very great regard for merit or qualification. It has been, I imagine, largely a question of who recommended the appointee. From the standpoint of patronage it has been a perfectly glorious time to be a Democratic Congressman.

Of course, I expect gentlemen on the other side, one after another, to arise and declare that they personally have not participated in this game of patronage; but if they have not, then they have allowed their colleagues to get away with something that legitimately, under the rules of the game as it has been played under the present administration, belongs to them. No gentleman arises in his seat to make the declaration I suggested, so I assume that all of the gentlemen here present have participated.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. If it is the rule of the game, why is the gentleman complaining if, under the rules of the game, he has not been a participant?

Mr. MONDELL. I have made no complaint. I have merely stated the fact.

Mr. SHERLEY. You were just voicing an appetite, then, instead of a complaint? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman had listened to me, he would have realized that I simply rose to perform a duty. [Laughter.] Some one ought to perform it, after all the polite and somewhat obscuring talk we have heard on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. After all the polite and somewhat befogging talk we have had upon this subject of appointments, it seemed to me but proper that some one should speak for a moment in words which would outline the situation as it is, and not as it would seem to be from some of the evidence presented before the committee and from some remarks that have been made on the floor.

I was about to remark when interrupted by my friend from Kentucky that it has been a perfectly glorious time to be a Democratic Member. If any of the gentlemen have any deserving constituents in their districts that are not now feeding at the public crib, it is an evidence of their lack of energy and activity in securing the jobs, which, in the division of the spoils, they seem to be entitled to.

Mr. GLASS. Might it not be an absence of taste for that sort of business?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, there may be gentlemen who do not have a taste for that sort of thing; and if there are any such, I am perfectly willing to yield to any such gentleman to now declare his lack of taste for patronage.

Mr. GLASS. I do not hesitate to declare mine, and I do not think it is anything creditable to anybody to say that he spends his time here looking for jobs.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, no Republican has put in his time in that way I am confident. If any have they have probably had no rewards for their trouble. I do not think, however, there is anything wrong about a man's getting positions for his constituents. I do not criticize anyone for doing that. I think if there are opportunities for public service and people are qualified and seek that service, it is the duty of Members of Congress to assist them in securing it. I am criticizing no one. I am simply putting into the RECORD a statement of the fact. I am not quarreling with the fact, but it occurred to me that it was well to have the fact stated while we were discussing these matters.

Mr. SHERLEY rose.

Mr. MONDELL. Did the gentleman from Kentucky desire to ask me a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no. I was just waiting until the gentleman had concluded his desultory remarks.

Mr. MONDELL. I had about concluded. The Government has needed a great many new employees. It has been impossible to secure them from the civil-service lists as rapidly as they have been needed. It is quite the natural thing for the party in control to make appointments on the recommendations of its members. I am not quarreling with that at all. But let it be understood; let it be known. I congratulate you gentlemen on your opportunities and on the heroic manner in which, so far as I am informed, you have availed yourselves of those opportunities. I hope that all those whom you have recommended will perform their service well, to the benefit of the whole country, and to the winning of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the committee and the country will feel like congratulating the distinguished gentleman on the moderate tone of his speech. Considering the pain that one with his political antecedents and appetite must undergo in seeing any enlargement of the public service without being able entirely to control its personnel, he has given an exhibition of self-restraint upon which I desire to heartily congratulate him. [Applause.]

Evidently the gentleman thinks that instead of having many of the heads Republicans, we ought to have the heads and those under them Republicans. It so happens that at the head of some of the very largest bureaus that have undergone the greatest expansion have been appointed men not because they were Republicans, but men because they were patriotic and proper citizens, but who nevertheless are Republicans and are administering those offices.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman be good enough to name some?

Mr. SHERLEY. I might name Mr. Garfield. I presume you claim him. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I invited a former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to put the names in the RECORD and he declined.

Mr. SHERLEY. One moment. As I said once before, it is so hard to define what is a Republican in good standing now that it is difficult to say what particular Republican will be admitted into association with a particular group of other Republicans. But I had hoped that as the result of the great amount of publicity we have seen lately there would be a getting together of those various wings of the party whereby you would be able to include so distinguished and prominent a gentleman as Mr. Garfield in your ranks. Now, there is your friend, Mr. Willcox. [Laughter.] Of course, he brings up such unpleasant memories that I do not like to mention his name now, but I could go on enumerating a number of these distinguished gentlemen who supposedly belong to your party. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. He received a deserved reward.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps so.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman furnish us a list of men who have been appointed to superior positions of honor and responsibility, with a good salary attached, whom he calls Republicans?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will if the gentleman will give me such a definition of Republicanism as will enable anybody to classify them. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I said as you will define them.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not willing to undertake to determine who shall be considered in good standing in your party. I have no desire to have such a responsible job devolved on me, or to undertake to answer for the future; but whenever you furnish the definition I will be glad to supply the list. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman in response to a question of my colleague has been able to mention two men whom he calls Republicans who have been given places in this administration, and I guess he mentioned all anyone could recollect. One of those, Dr. Garfield, was a supporter of Mr. Wilson. I do not call a man who voted for the President a Republican; and, at any rate, I do not call it an act of nonpartisanship in this administration to appoint such a man. It is no recognition of Republicans. It is an act of gratitude, of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. I suppose you explain Mr. Willcox's appointment on the ground of gratitude. We certainly are grateful to him as a party. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. Exactly. If there is one Republican to whom I think the Democrats ought to feel grateful it is Mr. Willcox. Therefore the two gentlemen whom the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has mentioned are two men whom it seems to me were clearly appointed not as an act of nonpartisanship but as a mere act of gratitude by the President. They were just the ordinary cases of patronage—giving an office in return for favors done.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to suggest to him that I hope the party will be equally generous to Mr. Hays in the future.

Mr. GILLETT. You will not have any occasion to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn without objection, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Federal Farm Loan Bureau: Four members of the board, at $10,000 each; secretary, $4,500; assistant secretary $3,000; 4 private secretaries, at $2,000 each; chiefs of divisions—bond division $3,000, statistical division $3,000, appraisement division $3,000, charter and reports division $3,000; assistant chief, bond division, $2,500; custodian of securities, $2,500; 5 examiners of securities, at $2,400 each; 12 registrars, at $4,000 each; chief examiner, $5,000; irrigation expert adviser, $4,800; clerks—3 of class 3, 5 of class 2, 9 of class 1, 7 at $1,000 each, 6 at $900 each; stenographers—4 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,000; messenger; 4 assistant messengers; in all, $186,820.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: Page 42, line 4, strike out "five" and insert "seven," and in line 10, strike out "$186,820" and insert "$189,220."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is simply to correct an error.

Mr. WINGO. Right on that point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. What does the gentleman understand the duties of these examiners of securities to be?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. These examiners of securities are men who are required to have legal information and banking information——

Mr. WINGO. I am not talking about their qualifications, but what "securities" does the Farm Loan Board hold?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will be patient for a moment I will tell him. These examiners are required to have legal information and also some banking experience. Roughly their duties are to investigate the securities that are taken by all of these 12 land banks. These securities are sent in here by the local banks which make the loans. These examiners of securities are expected to examine them closely and see whether or not the law has been complied with, whether the loan was justified upon its face, and whether every step necessary to comply with the law was taken, and upon their statement is based the action of the farm-loan commissioners in determining whether or not these farm-loan banks are entitled to issue bonds upon the loans so made. If they are rejected, of course the securities are turned back to the banks, and the banks must carry the loans themselves or correct them in accordance with the law.

Mr. WINGO. Are these men legal examiners?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I have just stated, they are legal examiners, and it was stated by the Federal Farm Loan Commissioner that they must have some banking information, also. At least that has been required in making the appointments.

Mr. WINGO. They do not examine any stocks or bonds, or anything of that kind, do they?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They do not examine any stocks or bonds; no.

Mr. WINGO. Is the farm-loan bank authorized to invest in any securities except land securities?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. WINGO. So that really they are lawyers? Is that what the gentleman understands?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know whether they are all graduates of law or not.

Mr. WINGO. They are supposed to have at least a reasonable amount of legal intelligence.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman tell me whether or not these are the gentlemen who have undertaken to determine what is necessary in abstracts of title?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; these gentlemen have nothing to do with that. Their duties are confined exclusively to the examination of securities.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman tell me what official named herein is responsible for the present requirements with reference to abstracts?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not state that to the gentleman, unless it is the board itself. Of course, as the gentleman knows, each bank has a legal adviser. Now, I take it that the broad question as to what is necessary in the way of abstracts of title was in the end left with the entire Farm Loan Board.

Mr. WINGO. So the gentleman thinks the only duty of these men is to see whether the loans have been properly made, and whether or not bonds are to be issued on securities which have been taken by the bank, which, of course, are nothing but mortgages on land?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Their duties are to examine these securities, which are sent in here by thousands from these banks, and to pass upon them.

Mr. WINGO. They are sent in here to Washington, are they?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are sent in to Washington.

Mr. WINGO. All these mortgages?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. All these mortgages are sent in to Washington, and they are here examined, and if approved by the Farm Loan Board, then that particular farm-loan bank is authorized——

Mr. WINGO. To make the loans?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; the loans are made in advance, as I just said.

Mr. WINGO. That was what I understood.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I have stated, when loans are improperly made they are turned back to the bank, and the bank has to carry them itself, and is not permitted to issue bonds upon them unless the securities are corrected so as to comply with the law.

Mr. WINGO. Who is the attorney for this board? What is his designation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The board has no attorney expressly provided for it. One of the commissioners is an attorney.

Mr. WINGO. Who is that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Judge Lobdell.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; that is true; but they have no advisory attorney here?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee upon what basis is the rating of salaries in these new bureaus, such as the one under consideration, made so much higher than the salaries in some of the old established institutions of the Government, like the Library of Congress, for example? Do we understand that the men who are capable of taking these positions must be of a higher grade of ability than the men who are in the research work in the Library of Congress, for instance? I have looked over the rating of salaries for the Farm Loan Board and see that they are very much higher.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If there is any difference in the salaries provided for in the new bureaus and those carried in the old bureaus, I take it that it is due in some measure to the time when they were fixed, because the gentleman knows that a dollar does not go so far now as it did a number of years ago. I want to say that in fixing these salaries it is necessary for the Farm Loan Board to compete with banks and trust companies in order to secure competent and capable employees. The gentleman will notice that when it comes to the clerical force that they are provided for in the same grades carried in other bureaus, but when it comes to men required to have some expert knowledge they have been compelled to pay them salaries somewhat in excess of the high-paid clerks.

Mr. FESS. I am not penurious about the matter and do not want to make any comparisons without foundation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman that, so far as the salaries in the Congressional Library are concerned, many of them are ridiculously low. That has been my opinion ever since I have been a member of this committee. This committee has undertaken, with reference to some of the very low salaries, to raise them.

Mr. FESS. I am glad to know that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We have raised them to a slight extent; but I will say that it is not the province of the Appropriation Committee to enter into the work of revising the entire salaries of any particular bureau, because that is legislation which Congress can enact in the usual way if it sees fit to do so.

Mr. FESS. I want to make an observation, if the Chairman will indulge me, that the war bureau has to do with the handling of wealth and securities and things of an unusual money value, and ask whether the salaries would likely be greater than those that have reference purely to educational work. That seems to run through the entire gamut of society. However, I do not think it is quite well founded, because the amount of money required to prepare one for research work is tremendously expensive and ought to be recognized by the payment of better salaries.

Now, in this increase of the number of employees that must go through the civil service I presume there has been a great demand for help put upon the civil service and a great deal of labor in getting these people ready. I have wondered whether there has not been a little abuse there growing out of the increased demand. I have in mind this instance that I would like to have the chairman know.

The head of one bureau called a man to assist him. I know these facts, or at least I have been told by persons in whom I have confidence, so that I can give the names of the head of the bureau and the man, if desired. The man called was very much desired because of the character of the work he had already done, which was very well known. He was told that he would have to take an examination. An examination was taken, and he ascertained when the report came in that he had failed to pass. In making some investigation he found that his own papers had been graded by some high-school assistants who had been called in to do this work.

I can see how a list of examinations might be graded by a high-school boy, but in a case of this kind it seemed that here was a great abuse of the civil service in calling in that kind of service that would require more than mere verbal knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. That sort of a performance I think is an abuse wherever it was done, and especially where the one whose examination must show some expert knowledge.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the papers were graded by a high-school student?

Mr. FESS. That is what I understand, some assistant that was called in.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am surprised to hear that. I agree with the gentleman in his criticism of that sort of action. I will state to the gentleman that the chairman of the Civil Service Commission stated to the committee that, in order to dispose of a great amount of work and a great number of papers, he had employed public-school teachers of the city to work in the evenings, paying them for two or three hours' time, in order to dispose of as many papers as possible. I did not understand that anyone had employed a high-school student.

Mr. FESS. I think it might be well to make an investigation to see whether the high-school teachers did not pass it over to the students.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If they did, it was an improper thing to do. However, I may say that the school-teachers who have been doing the work did it in order to get extra pay, for, as the gentleman is aware, their salaries are ridiculously low.

Mr. FESS. Oh, I would not object to their doing the work.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the work was done at the office of the commission and not at their home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Supervising Architect: Supervising Architect, $5,000; executive officer, $3,250; technical officer, $3,000; drafting division—superintendent $3,000, assistant superintendent $2,750; mechanical engineering division—superintendent $2,750, assistant superintendent $2,400; structural division—superintendent $2,750, assistant superintendent $2,400; superintendents—computing division $2,750, repairs division $2,400, accounts division $2,500, maintenance division $2,500; files and records division—chief, $2,500, assistant chief $2,250; head draftsman, $2,500; administrative clerks—8 at $2,000 each; 4 technical clerks, at $1,800 each; clerks—9 of class 4, additional to 1 of class 4 as bookkeeper $100, 4 at $1,700 each, 14 of class 3, 6 at $1,500 each, 13 of class 2, 8 at $1,300 each, 21 of class 1, four at $1,100 each, 7 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each, 2 at $840 each; photographer, $2,000; foreman, duplicating galley, $1,800; 2 duplicating paper chemists, at $1,200 each; foreman, vault, safe, and lock shop, $1,200; 5 messengers; 2 assistant messengers; messenger boys—1 at $600, 2 at $480 each, 2 at $360 each; skilled laborers—4 at $1,000 each, 7 at $960 each, 1 at $900, 1 at $840; laborers—1 at $660, 1 at $600; in all, $221,020.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In this item for the Supervising Architect it appears possible that there is no deserving Democrat in the country who is competent to be appointed Supervising Architect. For the last two years, I think, or more this office has been vacant and the duties have been performed by the executive officer, Mr. Wetmore, a very competent and courteous official, and one who is fully able to perform the duties of the Supervising Architect. While I am not calling attention to this in the hope that perhaps some nondeserving Republican may be appointed to this office, I think it is unfair in a great department like this that we should appropriate for a Supervising Architect the sum of $5,000 and leave that position vacant and impose upon the executive officer, without increase in salary, in addition to the duties of his position, the work of the Supervising Architect. It may be that by reason of the order issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of December 26, 1917, to the effect that no matter what the Congress of the United States might decide, no matter how much money they should appropriate or what authorizations they should issue, the Supervising Architect, or the Office of the Supervising Architect, was ordered to cease work and directed that no new buildings were to be placed under contract unless their urgency was established to the satisfaction of the Assistant Secretary in charge. In other words, if Congress should deem a new building urgent and authorize an appropriation and authorize the acquisition of a site, the Secretary of the Treasury decrees that that money should not be expended unless some Assistant Secretary of the Treasury is satisfied as to its urgency. All expansion of buildings he orders, where the urgency is established to the satisfaction of the Assistant Secretary, are to be placed on the market for bids, and then he also decrees that no additional sites are to be selected until further orders are given by the Secretary. It would seem that an order such as this goes a little beyond the bounds of an Executive order, and Congress is the proper body to determine the urgency of a building or the urgency of acquiring sites, and also that we are the proper body to determine whether such buildings should be constructed.

With these few preliminary remarks, I now desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he has any information respecting the reason why the office of Supervising Architect is now vacant, and has been vacant for the past two or three years; and, further, whether there is any likelihood that an official will be found in the near future to fill that office?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that I have no information as to why that office is not now filled. My recollection is that it has been vacant for at least a year, and possibly longer. In reply to the statement of the gentleman that it may be due to the fact that no competent and deserving Democrat can be found to fill the place, I want to say that that is clearly a mistake, because if the Secretary of the Treasury would call on me I could name several exceedingly competent and deserving Democrats from my own district, and I am sure other gentlemen could do likewise. I take it the reason this position is not filled now is due to the fact that there is not any great existing need for a Supervising Architect, particularly at this time. The gentleman has just referred to an order curtailing the work of this bureau. The executive officer, who is a very competent gentleman, and who has been in the service for many years, has taken care of the office with entire satisfaction. Inasmuch as the failure to make this appointment results in a saving to the Treasury of $5,000 each and every year, I assume the gentleman is not disposed to offer any serious criticism of the failure to fill the office.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, my criticism or suggestion was that it seemed to me unfair to the executive officer, Mr. Wetmore, that he should have these additional burdens and responsibilities placed upon him when we provide by law for an official to assume those responsibilities, and that if we are going to conduct that office without a Supervising Architect we might well provide that he should be the head of the office and compensate him accordingly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. His duties now are not nearly so onerous as they would have been a year or two ago, because the department, as the gentleman has just indicated, has suspended the erection of Federal buildings throughout the country, except where there is a peculiar and important reason for putting them up.

Mr. MONDELL. But Mr. Wetmore has been serving at a time when there was a great deal of activity in the office.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that is true.

Mr. MONDELL. And has been filling the position with great credit.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is entirely correct in that statement.

Mr. MONDELL. I think when the time comes to make an appointment—and I am not insisting upon it at this time—it would be a commendable thing to appoint the present Acting Supervising Architect.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That may be entirely true; but I want to say to the gentleman that the fact that here is an office that pays $5,000 a year which remains unfilled is a refutation of the gentleman's remarks awhile ago, in which he accused the Democrats of being overanxious to secure places in the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, if the gentleman will allow me, not at all. The opportunity was lacking in this particular case. That is the real reason.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Secretary of the Treasury, who is a distinguished Democrat, has had the authority to fill this place ever since it became vacant.

Mr. MONDELL. I have no doubt but that that distinguished and astute gentleman had very excellent reasons for not calling on the faithful to present candidates for this particular position, and we are somewhat enlightened in regard to that by the remarks the gentleman has just made himself to the effect that he thought he could find two or three candidates who could fill the office acceptably from his own district.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure of that, and I have no doubt that the gentleman has some one in his own State who could fill the position acceptably. I have not requested the appointment of anyone.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not been looking up any material recently.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that during the time the Office of Supervising Architect has been vacant the architectural work has been done outside of the department? Have not the plans and specifications for Federal buildings which have been constructed during the vacancy which is now existing in this office been drawn outside of the department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman my impression is—in fact, my very clear understanding is—that plans and specifications are drawn in the Office of the Supervising Architect, except, possibly, in one or two instances.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman who is now in charge of the department is not an architect?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. REAVIS. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He is provided, of course, with quite a number of draftsmen who are not carried in this bill but are carried in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, what I have to say probably is not pertinent to the pro forma amendment I have made, and, as a Republican, I may be somewhat offside in saying what I have in mind. I have encountered a great deal of the inefficiency complained of in several of the departments in Washington, particularly with reference to departments directly connected with military activities. I feel, however, that it is only fair for me to state that my experience with the War-Risk Bureau has demonstrated that there is not a more accommodating, a more efficient department in Washington. I have never gone to them that I have not been treated with the utmost courtesy, and I have never gone there upon an errand asking for information that it has not been promptly furnished me. I felt it was fair to them, inasmuch as it was my experience, that I state this. I could only wish that other departments were as efficient as I have found the War Risk Bureau to be. They are undertaking a tremendous work, a work that is in a new field so far as this Nation is concerned. Largely by the activities of that department over 90 per cent of a million and a half of soldiers in the American Army are to-day insured. I have gone to them in one instance in particular where I made a request for service that was exceedingly difficult to perform. Mr. De Lanoy, who was at the head of the bureau I went to, put several of his assistants to work on it and I had the information before night that I had no expectation of getting within a week. This brief statement is purely voluntary, but I felt it was due, inasmuch as they have been subject to some criticism here, to state that my experience with them indicated to me at least that they are both accommodating and efficient. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whom the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] had in mind when he said there had been some criticism of the War-Risk Bureau. I have been paying some attention to the discussion, and I can not recall having heard any special criticism of the bureau, though I did say something of their practice in the matter of appointments. I will say this, however, that my experience with the bureau has not been along the line of the happy experience of the gentleman from Nebraska, probably due to the fact that the cases I have called to their attention were of a character with respect to which it was impossible just at the time to give the desired information. I have no doubt but what they have tried to do the best they could under the trying circumstances and conditions under which they have organized and gotten under way.

Referring again for just a moment to the general matter of appointments, let me say that no one on this side complains because under a Democratic administration appointments outside of the civil service are made from among the faithful. It is true, in other days of war a great administration called men of other parties than that of the President to the councils of the Nation, but I have no criticism to offer because that has not been done under this administration. What strikes me as being rather remarkable, and in a way regrettable, is that in the midst of a great war, when those charged with responsibility should be giving all their time and attention to matters connected with the war and the winning of it, some one about the administration has found the time and the inclination to search the country with a fine-tooth comb, in connection with appointments to the few commissions where the law requires that at least a part of the membership shall be of another political party than that of the majority, to find appointees who, whatever they may be are not Republicans, even by their own definition. In all such cases some one has found time in the midst of war and its stress, alarms, and trials to search the country over to find some one who, according to some peculiar classification might be called a Republican, all the time exercising very great care that those so selected were in no case Republicans by the test and proof of having supported Republican candidates and Republican policies.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Have not we the word of the newly elected chairman of the Republican committee that there are no factions now in the Republican Party? Does the gentleman mean to inform us there are real factions in the Republican Party and the Republicans are in very doubtful shape?

Mr. MONDELL. No; there are no factions, but the President has found men who were descendants of Republicans or who at one time were said to be Republicans, but who, at least in late years, have been supporting Democratic candidates, gentlemen who organized Wilson clubs and aided in the election of the President who he has seen fit to name as the Republican representatives on boards and commissions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, speaking seriously, when the Congress says that a commission shall be bipartisan, would not it reflect good taste and indicate good intent really to make it bipartisan and put on the commission some one definitely and beyond question of the minority party? Is it not extraordinary that in time of war men should find time or have the inclination to turn aside from the great affairs of the Nation and spend time hunting up folks whose appointment does not fairly and honestly meet the intent of Congress? In my opinion it does not reflect credit on anyone, that sort of political camouflaging, especially at a time when the minority is stanchly supporting the administration. This searching the country over as though there were not competent men of the opposition to find some one who supported the party in power, who may, however, by some peculiar and questionable definition invented for the occasion be classified as a Republican, does not strike me as being a very commendable or honorable employment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I submit to the gentleman from Wyoming that is the misfortune of the Republican Party, the fact that there are so many different kinds of Republicans that it is impossible to get the appointment of the particular kind whom the gentleman might characterize as a Republican.

Mr. MONDELL. No; the party is suffering from no such misfortune. It is the misfortune of the peculiar frame of mind of the men who stoop to do those things.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I am not inclined to make any criticism of any character of inefficiency that might grow out of the creation of new bureaus or the enlargement of old ones, since such observations frequently fail of any good purpose on the scale of mere criticism. And I am free to overlook some of these lapses, if they are inevitable, from lack of preparation, or if they are not serious. But once in a while we have brought to our attention some things that ought really never to take place, which demand public attention to induce greater care in public service.

I hold in my hand an envelope sent from my home town by the father of a boy in the ranks, now overseas, who was here in the engineering training camp at the American University grounds. This letter was returned to the father and marked in red ink, "Deceased," and in another place on the envelope the word written out, "Died." These parents were in the most agonized condition of mind, and, not having heard anything of serious illness, they took it up with me at once, to know why that, if the soldier had passed away, the parents had not been notified. The envelope was postmarked at the home office November 28 and at the receiving office February 9. Before I could make an investigation they had received a letter from their son overseas, which of course relieved them of further anxiety. I sent an inquiry at once to The Adjutant General, asking him about this boy, and he referred the matter to the headquarters of the American University Camp. Under date of March 2, 1918, was received a letter, as follows:

The man alluded to herein is a member of Company E, Second Battalion, Twentieth Engineers, which organization left this camp for over-seas duty about November 10. No reason is known at this camp for the word "Died" on the inclosed envelope. It is the practice at this camp to forward all mail for members of organizations which have left for overseas to the foreign station of the organization. The enlisted men who handled mail at the time this letter was received have departed for overseas. There is no record at this camp of the death of W. W. Drake. Every effort is made to see that all mail for men of organizations which have occupied this camp is forwarded to its proper destination and to exercise every consideration for all personal inquiries made of this camp.

It is evident that the boy is all right, because they have received at home a letter from him. But I think that a thing of this kind is totally inexcusable and ought not to have any basis for an apology. Had it taken place at the front no one would be greatly surprised, or in camps where thousands of men are stationed, but it should not occur where small groups are collected. And while, as I say, at this time one does not want to seem to be frivolous in criticism, because of the tremendous work the War Department has to do, here is a case that certainly ought not to have occurred. I do not offer this as hypercritical criticism in time of war, neither did I call attention to the exasperating delays of the war-risk insurance work in adjusting the family allowances for the sake of mere faultfinding, since I am not unaware of the tremendous work this bureau must shoulder, but simply as a suggestion that more care be given to matters now of importance when the public is being called upon to give its undivided support to the country.

The Clerk read as follows:

Auditing accounts abroad: For salaries and expenses incurred under section 12 of the act of September 24, 1917, including traveling expenses, per diem not exceeding $4 in lieu of subsistence for officers and employees absent from Washington, rent, cablegrams and telegrams, printing, law books, books of reference, periodicals, stationery, office equipment and exchange thereof, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, $700,000, of which not exceeding $25,000 may be expended at Washington for the purposes of this section, but no officer or employee shall receive for duty in Washington any compensation other than his regular salary.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the idea of the provision in lines 9 and 10? Can the gentleman state that this is for auditing accounts abroad, with a limit of $25,000, of the $700,000, that may be expended in Washington?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is to take care of the additional work thrown on the office in order to handle the accounts as they are sent here after they have been audited abroad.

Mr. WALSH. Well, they have already increased the allowance in the comptroller's office for the work here, have they not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is quite true; but the idea was to keep this particular work separate from the other work of the bureau. I will say to the gentleman that this work is being performed by the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Auditor of the War Department jointly. They requested that this amount be set apart for use here in Washington to take care of these particular accounts.

Mr. WALSH. That is the only reason for that limitation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the only explanation I can give the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. And that is probably for services and not purchase of equipment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is for personal service.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for Post Office Department: Auditor, $5,000; assistant and chief clerk, $3,000; law clerk, $3,000; expert accountant, $3,000; four chiefs of division, at $2,250 each; four assistant chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; three principal bookkepers, at $2,000 each; clerks—25 of class 4, 43 of class 3, 49 of class 2, 51 of class 1, 12 at $900 each; skilled laborers—5 at $840 each, 11 at $720 each, 5 at $660 each; messenger boys—5 at $540 each, 4 at $480 each, 5 at $420 each; 9 male laborers, at $660 each; forewoman, $480; 19 charwomen; in all, $324,520.

For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of such number of employees as may be necessary to audit the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service, $297,130: Provided, That not exceeding $43,200 may be used for the payment of compensation to said employees absent on leave.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is it not rather unusual for the compensation of any of these clerks to be fixed by the head of the department rather than by act of the committee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Those who are employed under this lump sum are paid on a piecework basis. They are not paid regular stipulated salaries, but they are paid according to the work done.

Mr. FESS. That explains it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Secret Service Division: Chief, $4,500; assistant chief, who shall discharge the duties of chief clerk, $3,500; clerks—2 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 2 of class 1, 1 $1,000; assistant messenger; in all, $20,120.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is not possible that $20,120 is all the money expended in the interest of the Secret Service?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is just the office force, I will say to the gentleman. The field force is carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. There is over $20,000,000 spent every year in the Secret Service in one way or another.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman refers to the entire Government and not to the Treasury Department.

Mr. MADDEN. Before the war, and in times of peace, we spent over $20,000,000 in Secret Service work. This has only to do with counterfeiting.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And the customs, too, and also the protection of the President. But the field force in this particular bureau is carried in another appropriation.

Mr. FESS. The Secret Service work since the war began must have increased tremendously over what it was before the war.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has, in the Department of Justice. There has been no great increase of the Secret Service in the Treasury Department, but there have been a great many additional special agents appointed in the Department of Justice. Then I am reminded that the intelligence service of the Army and Navy has been largely increased.

Mr. FESS. It probably would not be advisable to make public the amount of money expended under this particular service. I wondered whether we had access to the amount.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure that the Attorney General would be very glad to furnish the gentleman with that information. He made statements along that line as to the number of special agents employed at the time of his hearing, but stated that he preferred that no publicity should be given to the facts. I may say that the sundry civil bill carries a specific appropriation, although it does not attempt or undertake to provide how many special agents there shall be.

Mr. FESS. That line of service is very effective, is it not, just now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is. They are doing a splendid work under the leadership of the chief of the special agents in the Department of Justice.

Mr. FESS. It is all-pervasive, reaching every part of the United States?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. It reaches every section of the country, and other countries also.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Surgeon General of Public Health Service: Surgeon General, $6,000; chief clerk, $2,250; private secretary to the Surgeon General, $1,800; statistician, $2,000; technical assistant, $2,000; assistant editor, $1,800; librarian, $1,600; clerks—4 of class 4, 5 of class 3, 8 of class 2 (1 of whom shall be translator), 14 of class 1, 6 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each; messenger; 3 assistant messengers; telephone operator, $720; 2 laborers, at $540 each; in all, $74,150.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, legislation is very badly needed to permit the President to rearrange and reassign the various bureaus and offices between the executive departments. In fact, that legislation ought to go further in giving him the right to consolidate a great many bureaus. Most of these bureaus which the Committee on Appropriations finds in existence in certain departments were fixed there years ago, at a time when the Cabinet was very much smaller and the duties, of course, were purely incidental.

As to this office of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, nobody on earth can give any reason why that should be in the Treasury Department. There is some reason why the Coast Guard should be in the Treasury Department, because originally that was the Revenue-Cutter Service, designed to prevent smuggling, and it was an aid in the collection of the revenue. But that particular system of detecting smuggling has practically passed out of existence. Smuggling by fast clipper ships, sailing vessels, does not take place any more nowadays. Every vessel on the ocean approaching our shores is known to the Government hours before it reaches port, so that nothing of that sort or character can occur. There is not a particle of reason why that service should not be under the Department of Commerce, or possibly under the Navy Department. It certainly should not be under the Treasury Department.

The same is true of this office of Public Health Service. I will call the attention of the House to the fact that we keep making appropriations year after year for these various bureaus that may be in great danger of overlapping. In fact, practical experience has shown that they are in danger of overlapping the duties of other bureaus, and the reason for that is very largely due to the fact that one bureau happens to be under one department and another bureau happens to be under another department. As I say, I think that legislation ought to go fully to the extent of permitting the consolidation of any two or more bureaus, so as to reduce the number of bureaus and increase the efficiency of the departments.

Whenever any new proposition comes up the simplest way for Congress to solve it is to create a new bureau, entailing a new and permanent expense on the people. That new bureau usually starts out with some popularity; it seems to answer a public demand; and it is a good way to assure the people that their rights are being taken care of. Then when another proposition comes up we always create another bureau, and that immediately has a popularity.

Here is one temptation these bureaus have: Every bureau that is under the charge of a live and ambitious man—and I hope most of them are, and some of them seem to be—has a tendency to enlarge its own jurisdiction. It reaches out and sees fields of usefulness that it can cover, where it can render useful service. It attempts to absorb those fields, although they may sometimes be partially and sometimes be wholly within the legitimate sphere of other bureaus of the Government. There are a number of overlapping activities now in the departments, too many for us now to enumerate, but there are large numbers of them that ought to be eliminated at this time when we are at war and when we are trying to have the highest efficiency in the Federal Goverment. Now is an excellent time for us to have a complete readjustment and reassignment of these bureaus and abolish, I think, quite a number of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any law that forbids the head of a department from merging the activities of one bureau with another, or from rearranging the respective bureaus and merging their work with that of other bureaus?

Mr. BORLAND. There are some laws that evidently forbid it, because some laws create special bureaus specially.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit further, for instance, since the war broke out, in the Navy Department the Division of Naval Militia Affairs has been consolidated——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the time of the gentleman from Missouri may be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been consolidated with the Bureau of Navigation. When I was a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads I remember distinctly that it was stated that the head of the Post Office Department had authority to consolidate the activities of the respective bureaus and transfer the work of the Fourth Assistant's office to the First Assistant's office. That was done frequently, so that I do not think that there is any law that forbids the rearrangement of the bureaus or the consolidation of them if the head of a department sees fit to do so.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think the matter is quite so simple as the gentleman from Wisconsin seems to think it is. Doubtless there are some bureaus that are created by Executive order which can be abolished or changed by an Executive order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In a moment. But there are a large number of bureaus created by specific acts of Congress over which heads of the departments would have no such power.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman's idea is that we would have better economy if we would coordinate the work?

Mr. BORLAND. I think so.

Mr. MADDEN. There would not be any trouble about the head of the bureau deciding to have 10 men instead of 15 if he could do the work with 10?

Mr. BORLAND. Unless human nature is reformed, there is no possibility of that thing happening.

Mr. MADDEN. They could do it, could they not?

Mr. BORLAND. It does not happen. What happens is just this: We go on creating new bureaus for new activities. We leave all the old ones in existence. Just now we are creating a large number of new activities of the Government, some of which we hope will pass out of existence when this war is over; but that hope may not be justified in the realization. Most of them will hang on tenaciously for years after this war is over. Wherever a man is put at the head of a bureau, however small, insignificant, or obsolete it may be, the inclination of human nature is to attempt to convince the public that it is an important factor and that there is some very important work that it can do for the public. If there is not any work to be found in its immediate activity, the head of that bureau will immediately search for new activities that he thinks he can perform. That is a very creditable trait in these men. It shows that they are active and ambitious public servants.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Is the gentleman speaking academically, or is he referring particularly to the Public Health Service?

Mr. BORLAND. I have no particular reference to the Public Health Service, although its activities have been wonderfully expanded; but I have been very strongly in favor of their being expanded. But I am not in favor of their being under the Treasury Department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What department ought they to be under?

Mr. BORLAND. The Department of the Interior.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Why?

Mr. BORLAND. That is where they belong.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last 10 words. Replying to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri in reference to tendencies in the public service, the tendency at the present time is not toward economy but rather toward extravagance. In my judgment, the coordination of the bureaus would not result in any degree of economy.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon me just a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. In all the years I have served with the gentleman I have failed to find any suggestion of a great economy that did meet the gentleman's views. His views on economy are rather abstract.

Mr. MADDEN. I have never wasted much of the time of the House, as a rule, in arguing how you could create a more economical administration of national affairs by the coordination of bureaus. The gentleman says he hopes that if the thing which he describes can be done, we will get greater efficiency and certain economies. There is nothing in the world to prevent the bureau chiefs now from instituting economies if they have the public interest at heart. I am inclined to agree with the statement made by my friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] that when the war is over all these new activities will linger on, because those on the floor of the House and the Senate who were responsible for the appointment of most of these people in the bureaus and departments will insist that their political patronage shall not be curtailed. And I have no doubt that the gentleman from Missouri will be one of these, for I assume that he is very close to the throne and that he has not hesitated to ask the king for a proper division of the patronage from Missouri. As long as the character of service which the gentleman renders remains, with his time partially taken up with camouflage on the floor and the rest of the time trying to find jobs for his constituents, we will not reach that stage of economy to which the country is entitled.

I would like to join the gentleman in a movement for economy if I knew what he had in mind.

Mr. BORLAND. I can suggest one to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The purpose which the gentleman has in mind is kept so well covered up that a novice like myself is never able to discover it. He is very adept at words, and he understands how to express words to cover up his thought so well that when he concludes one of these speeches intended to elucidate a complicated situation, it is more complicated than it was before. So I am always at a loss to know just exactly what position I ought to take, if I am to base my reasoning on the offerings of the gentleman in the way of new reforms. Economy can be instituted only at the fountain head, and if the men who are in control of the executive branches of the Government want economy, the economy will follow as a matter of course, because they will not employ three men where one man will do the work, and I fear that in many cases to-day we have three men doing one man's work and sometimes three men not doing one-third of one man's work. They are in the way of one another. When you walk through the hallways in some of the public buildings you have to push your way through to get by the messengers in the hallways, but if you stop to inquire from any messenger whom you meet in the hallway what is the name of the officer in the next room to where he is sitting, he will not be able to tell you.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Why is it that it takes so long, then, to get a reply to inquiries for information in these places?

Mr. MADDEN. The reason it takes so long is that nobody there knows anything. That is the reason we are not getting anywhere.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Has the gentleman any suggestions to make?

Mr. MADDEN. What is the use of making suggestions to people who do not understand intelligent organization? It would be throwing suggestions to the winds to make them to the gentleman from Baltimore.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For stationery, including tags, labels, and index cards printed in course of manufacture, for the Treasury Department and its several bureaus and offices, $62,200, and in addition thereto sums amounting to $235,800 shall be deducted from other appropriations made for the fiscal year 1919, as follows: Contingent expenses, Independent Treasury, $6,000; contingent expenses, mint at Philadelphia, $700; contingent expenses, mint at San Francisco, $300; contingent expenses, mint at Denver, $300; contingent expenses, assay office at New York, $700; materials and miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of Engraving and Printing, $6,000; suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes, $700; Public Health Service, $3,500; Quarantine Service, $1,000; preventing the spread of epidemic diseases, $600; expenses of Coast Guard, $5,000; general expenses of public buildings, $6,000; collecting the revenue from customs, $40,000; miscellaneous expenses of Internal-Revenue Service, $50,000; expenses of collecting the income tax, $70,000; stationery and miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, $45,000; and said sums so deducted shall be credited to and constitute, together with the first-named sum of $62,200, the total appropriation for stationery for the Treasury Department and its several bureaus and offices, with the exception of field officers located in foreign countries, for the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee what this language, line 10, page 54, means, "general expenses of public buildings, $6,000."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is an item carried in the sundry civil bill. The gentleman will see that this is only a transfer of $6.000 of that fund to the contingent expenses for the Treasury Department for the purchase of stationery through one central agency. There is an appropriation made in the sundry civil bill for general expenses to pay draftsmen, superintendents of public buildings, inspectors, traveling expenses, office rent, expenses of superintendent, and so forth, in the field service.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Those are all appropriations for a specifically named purpose. This is for general expenses for buildings. That covers a good deal of ground.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That refers to the title under which the general appropriation is made. The gentleman will understand that this is not an additional appropriation, but a transfer of a portion of that fund for the purchase of stationery, and it is carried under the head of general expenses because that is the title under which it is carried on the books of the Treasury.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand. If that is carried under that head on the books of the Treasury, would anyone looking at the books know what that money was to be used for? If this is a specific appropriation for the purchase of stationery, why does it not say so?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The account is carried under the head of general expenses of public buildings. The sundry civil bill names the purposes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But this is the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely; but this does not make any additional appropriation. It simply transfers $6,000 of that fund to the contingent expenses of the Treasury, so that stationery may be purchased through one general supply committee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I still think, notwithstanding the very clear and lucid statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, that that is not a good way to appropriate money. The transfer of appropriations ought to be made perfectly clear, so that anyone reading it would know what the particular money transferred and appropriated is to be used for.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will read the beginning of the paragraph, he will find that it is "for stationery, including tags, labels, and index cards." The only way to transfer it was to use the same language that was used in making the general appropriation.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen will permit me, I made a statement the other day that my observation led me to think that they had some kind of a system in the department whereby they would transfer one fund to another fund, borrow it out of another fund, and then pay it back. That statement was contradicted. I thought I was right about it. It seems to me that the statement just made by the gentleman from Tennessee to the gentleman from Wisconsin rather bears out that idea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If there is any such practice it is in plain violation of law. Now, this appropriation here is an entirely different proposition. Here is a paragraph which is for the purchase of stationery for various bureaus of the Treasury Department. The sundry civil bill carries an appropriation for general expenses for public buildings amounting to more than $500,000. The legislative bill does not undertake to increase the amount, but simply transfers $6,000 of that to the contingent expenses of the Treasury for the particular and sole purpose of purchasing stationery. It is purely in the interest of economy to have the stationery purchased through one head.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was not criticizing the action of the committee. Now, one other thing. I was impressed the other day by the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] in regard to the methods of bookkeeping down there. I think he was eminently correct in that. My experience is that nobody on earth, even the efficiency expert that we have talked about, could tell very much about how this money is expended by looking at the books of the Treasury Department. I would like to get the gentleman's idea, if he has looked into the matter carefully, as to whether or not the impression I have in regard to it is correct. Now, I found at one time what I thought was conclusive evidence that there was this shifting about, borrowing and paying back, and so forth.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, this is what I meant to convey and what I think is true. The system of bookkeeping is accurate enough to prevent the misuse of funds——

Mr. HAMLIN. That is, one department paying out more money than is appropriated for it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Or paying it out for other than what it was appropriated for. The system of bookkeeping is not such as to enable one to determine from a statement of the expenditures whether work is economically performed or not. For instance, the system of bookkeeping would prevent money that was appropriated for a specific purpose, like those enumerated for contingent expenses, being expended for some other purpose.

There is no system of bookkeeping which would show you whether contingent expenses, or purchases made for matters enumerated under the item of contingent expenses, were economically made or not. Modern methods of bookkeeping do permit that ascertainment from a review of them.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman whether it is not true that there is some kind of a system whereby a part of a fund, for instance, a contingent expense fund, in case of shortage in another fund, might be transferred to that fund and afterwards transferred back, so that in the end the aggregate expenditure does not exceed the sum appropriated. Is there a shifting of funds?

Mr. SHERLEY. This is the situation. The law requires the allotment of funds over a certain period so as to prevent the creation of deficiencies, and permits, under certain contingencies, a rearrangement of allotments to a certain extent. In such instances there is permitted the taking of sums from one fund for expenditure under another fund. Then there are also cases where, under the terms of appropriations, certain percentages of funds for one purpose may be made available for other purposes, and in such instances there can be borrowing, but there is no right to do it except where there is express provision of law.

Mr. HAMLIN. There ought to be some system that would prevent that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably.

Mr. HAMLIN. Because great harm could come from that. I withdrawn the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigation and experimentation and to secure better methods of administration, with a view to increased efficiency or to greater economy in the expenditure of public money, including necessary traveling expenses, in connection with special work, or obtaining of better administrative methods in any branch of the service within or under the Treasury Department, including the temporary employment of agents, stenographers, accountants, or other expert services either within or without the District of Columbia, $15,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This item is for investigation and experimentation and to secure better methods of administration, with a view to increased efficiency or to greater economy in the expenditure of public money, or in the obtaining of better administrative methods in any branch of the service. I notice in looking through the hearings that in spite of all the new bureaus and commissions and offices and departments that have been created, growing out of the war emergency, all that the department has been able to expend of this sum last year was about $3,000. It seems to me that in view of the showing made by the gentleman who appeared before the committee it is not necessary to appropriate $12,000 a year to enable a man to run hither and yon to find out whether he can approve the expenditure of public money. Certainly in these days there is not any need of increasing efficiency in the expenditure of the public money. There may be a need of greater economy, but it is a significant fact that in the expenditure of the appropriation for endeavoring to secure greater economy in the expenditure of public money they have practiced apparently a very great economy in that item and have spent only $3,000. I would like to ask the gentleman having charge of the bill if he really believes that in view of the great emergency it is necessary to carry this appropriation this year for the purpose set out in the hearing by the gentleman who appeared representing the department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I think so, I will say to the gentleman. This appropriation has been carried since 1910, for the purpose of securing better methods of administration in the department. I may say that the first appropriation was in 1910 in the deficiency act, and was for $25,000, and that for the next two years $75,000 was carried for this purpose. It was then reduced to $20,000 and is now $15,000. It is true that the chief clerk of the Treasury Department stated that only $3,000 had been expended at the time of the hearing, which was about the middle of the fiscal year, but he also stated that it was expected to consume either all or a portion of the remaining fund during the remainder of the fiscal year for the purpose of improving administration methods in the department.

Mr. WALSH. I thought we had a Bureau of Efficiency for that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true, a Bureau of Efficiency which is organized for the purpose of securing better administration and more efficient administration in all of the departments; but this very small sum of $15,000 is appropriated in order to enable the Secretary of the Treasury within his department to organize and put into effect better administrative methods.

I may say to the gentleman that there has been a committee in the Treasury Department composed of a number of bureau chiefs who have been making investigations and recommendations with a view of improving the service, and some improvements were made last year as a result of their report. It may be, and is true, as the gentleman says, that only $3,000 was expended the first six months of the year, but the chief clerk says that that fund will be put to good use between now and July, and they were anxious to have it carried for another year. I submit to the gentleman that a dollar that is spent wisely for the purpose of securing better administration in any of the departments is not improperly spent or extravagantly spent.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman talking about public money?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Talking about money being spent wisely?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I seem to have a recollection, I may be mistaken, of the Treasury having refused to allow the Bureau of Efficiency to work in their department. Was not that so? I did not know but this was a substitute for it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That, I think, was true. I do not know whether it amounted to an express refusal, but there was some question raised two or three years ago; but I will say to the gentleman that since that time, as he knows, the Bureau of Efficiency has been doing a great deal of work in the Treasury Department, the War-Risk Bureau, the Internal-Revenue Service, and also in the Treasurer's office.

Mr. GILLETT. I had a vague recollection this was instead, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; this has been carried since 1910.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. The hearings disclose that the Bureau of Efficiency has undertaken some of this work in the Treasury Department, and apparently this item is carried in order that the Treasury Department do its work itself, and I submit that it can not achieve as valuable results by having it done by its own officials as it can by an independent bureau. One of the wonderful accomplishments last year, I note, which was brought about, was that they bought a comptometer in the auditor's office. Now, apparently by way of criticism of the Bureau of Efficiency, it was stated it has been working in the Internal Revenue Department, and in the words of the gentleman who appeared before the subcommittee:

"The Internal Revenue Bureau was reorganized and turned upside down," and this appropriation sought to be justified was so that they can send men out in the field to travel around.

Now, I believe that while we have adopted a policy of having a bureau for this particular purpose that we ought to leave it to that bureau, and if their appropriation is not sufficient increase it, but I do not believe we can get the result from the appropriation left to the official in control of the department which is seeking to reorganize or under the direction of an official when in the performance of his work it may be necessary for him to criticize his superior officers or make suggestions reflecting on their judgment or methods of administration. I do not believe that sort of an official will be as free to make recommendations as one under an independent bureau or department of the Government. They only spent $3,000 last year, and here is an opportunity, in view of the amount we have given the Bureau of Efficiency this year, to save $12,000. Why, that would hire 12 extra janitors for some of the committees of the House at $1,000 per annum, or several barbers to operate on the gallery corridors or the carpet of the House. Here is an opportunity, I submit in all seriousness, to economize in this department and not in any way to hamper the efficiency or the investigations and the experimentations that may be made upon any office or official, and therefore I submit that the appropriation can be dispensed with and that it will be true economy if we eliminate it this year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It has been carried for seven or eight years and, as a matter of fact, is the only fund provided not only for the purpose indicated, but out of which the Secretary of the Treasury may pay traveling expenses.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is not the work that is provided for or contemplated to be done under the provisions of this paragraph work that is now being done by the Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, undoubtedly the Bureau of Efficiency is doing work——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But is not this a duplication of work?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say this to the gentleman: The Bureau of Efficiency, with the very little force it has at its command, $110,000 being carried in this bill—and to which I was surprised to note there was some objection raised by one or two Members—can not possibly investigate all of these departments and make all the investigations necessary in order to put into effect improved methods of administration. For instance, the Bureau of Efficiency for nearly four years has been at work in the Post Office Department with part of its force and has not yet fully completed the work of establishing efficiency ratings. They have been at work in the War-Risk Bureau; they are now in the Internal-Revenue Office; they have been in the Pension Office and in the Treasurer's office; but I submit that with 10 departments it is impossible for that bureau to do all this work for some time to come.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Have they in the four years they have been at work made any recommendations leading to efficiency?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes, indeed; in the Post Office Department alone they have reduced employees more than 190, with an average saving of over $173,000 every year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May we say that this would be a duplication of work and that it might interfere possibly with the work of the Bureau of Efficiency? One hundred and ten thousand dollars of annual appropriation is a considerable appropriation——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. They ought to make the investigation with $110,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true, and I submit to the gentleman they have made, as I attempted to show here Tuesday, extended investigations. In the Indian Bureau they have saved a considerable sum by way of interest, it is estimated, for the Indians.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Bureau of Efficiency, as a result of its investigation of the methods of accounting and disbursing in the field service.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why could they not be permitted to do this work in the Treasurer's department?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly, I say to the gentleman, the Bureau of Efficiency, if they had the time and had the force and the number of men qualified to do the work could go into this department and all the departments of this Government; but it is going to take many years with the limited force given to the Bureau of Efficiency to do this work. Now, I take this position, that here is the small sum of $15,000 appropriated for this particular purpose. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] says only $3,000 has been expended in the first six months, but if he will read further in the hearings that the chief clerk says he expects to spend an additional amount during the balance of the year.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who will have charge of this investigation in the Treasury?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Secretary of the Treasury, who acts through a committee appointed in the department.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Exactly. The Treasury officials, or the bureau chiefs, probably, or other men belonging to that particular department. Of necessity it will be impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury to give the slightest attention to it. The duties which have been imposed upon him by law are so manifold, onerous, and important that it would be impossible to think of his looking after this at all.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I said through a committee. It is impossible for him to give it his personal attention. That committee is headed by Judge Warwick, the Comptroller of the Treasury, who has under his jurisdiction the passing of accounts of this Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How many men in the employ of that department does the gentleman think the employees of that department are going to recommend to be discharged or done away with? It is going to take outside influence and outside investigation to do that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It does not necessarily mean the discharge of employees. And I do not think that is the scope of this appropriation. It means better administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I have made a private suggestion to the gentleman in charge of this bill, that to-day being the Speaker's birthday, and he will never have the opportunity to celebrate his sixty-eighth birthday again, it would be opportune for the committee to rise.

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope the gentleman will not press that suggestion. We have a bill here of 155 pages——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. I will state to the gentleman that we can proceed through the Internal Revenue Bureau here without trouble.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let us hear, on this side, what the gentleman is proposing?

Mr. DUPRÉ. What is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am trying to persuade the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] to permit us to proceed with the bill a little further.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman propose to go beyond page 62 to-night?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that if we should reach page 62 and the gentleman, or any other gentleman desires it, so far as I am concerned I will be glad to pass that until to-morrow.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will consent to rise if we get to page 62?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I have just stated I would be very glad to pass the Subtreasury item until to-morrow.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Louisiana withdraws his objection, will the gentleman move to rise when we get through with page 62?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I would not withdraw my suggestion, but I have not pressed it beyond that stage.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Louisiana and myself, I think, are interested in having some gentlemen here when we reach page 63.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, there is no desire to-night to press the controverted matter in this bill, which is that relating to the Subtreasuries. Here is a bill of 155 pages. We are getting to the point in the legislative program where, if we do not make more progress, we are going to have a considerable congestion and jam before the fiscal year ends. Everybody wants to adjourn Congress as early as possible. It is the delays such as this, not noticed, that in the aggregate make impossible the getting through of the work of Congress in good season.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I understand I have the floor.

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope the committee will continue the consideration of the bill until we strike some controversial matter, and then it can either be passed over or the committee can rise.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the reason why we do not make more progress is the hectoring we receive occasionally from the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, deputy collectors, surveyors, clerks, messengers, and janitors in internal-revenue offices, $3,565,000: Provided, That no part of this amount be used in defraying the expenses of any officer, designated above, subpœnaed by the United States court to attend any trial before a United States court or preliminary examination before any United States commissioner, which expenses shall be paid from the appropriation for "Fees of witnesses, United States courts."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania and Mr. WALSH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will be recognized first.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph provides a lump-sum appropriation of $3,565,000 for the purpose of paying salaries and expenses for those employed in the office of the Collector of Internal Revenue. Does the gentleman from Tennessee have detailed information as to the manner in which this money is expended?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the committee has information as to the manner in which it is expended by districts, and also the number of people that are employed under it, and the rates of pay.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman enumerate the number of men and women employed through this appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. At the present time the bureau has 1,450 persons employed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Fourteen hundred and fifty persons?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are employed throughout the United States, or in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is the field force.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What range do the salaries take, from the highest to the lowest?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. From $4,500 for the collectors down to $300 for the janitor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask why, inasmuch as all other salaries are set out in detail, this lump-sum provision is made in this particular case?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The collectors' salaries are fixed by law, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; and therefore under ordinary conditions they would be specifically reported in an appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not say to the gentleman why it has not been done, but it has never been the practice. It is simply a matter of custom to make a lump-sum appropriation. It has been done for years. I will say to the gentleman that so far as the deputy collectors are concerned, those salaries range from $2,500 down to the sum I named awhile ago, a great majority of them being at $1,200.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This appropriation is for $3,565,000, and following it comes an appropriation of $1,200,000, and following that an appropriation of $3,000,000, and following that one of $8,000,000, all for the one office.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true; and there is an additional appropriation for the administration of the narcotic law, amounting to over $300,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We give all those salaries in great detail for offices that are created by statute, and we have points of order constantly with regard to attempted increases which could not be made here. I would like to know whether, under this lump-sum appropriation system, where such vast sums are involved as in this case, it does not come within the discretion of the appointing power to increase or to reduce the salaries without the knowledge of Congress?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, it would be possible to set them forth here specifically; but, as I stated, it has never been the custom to do it, and the latitude that has been given to the Internal-Revenue Commissioner, both under Republican and Democratic administrations, never has been abused.

I submit to the gentleman that with the tremendous amount of increased work devolving upon the Internal Revenue Commissioner's office at this time, it was practically impossible for the Internal Revenue Commissioner to estimate with any degree of certainty how many employees he will need for the next year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the Department of Agriculture the employees are checked up, so that we know what they get, except in certain instances where lump-sum appropriations are made for groups of men or particular branches of the service; but here is an instance in which for one bureau of the Treasury Department we appropriate in a lump sum substantially $16,000,000—that is my rough guess of the total—which is at the disposal of the appointing power.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned, I understand that all its lump sums are available for salaries.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the committee information in print, from the Collector of Internal Revenue or the Treasury Department, specifying the various employees who are paid within the limitations of approximately $16,000,000 lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee has that information. I will say to the gentleman that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has submitted through the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress a statement showing just how he will expend the money appropriated, giving detailed information as to the number of employees, the salaries which will be paid, and so forth. This information is in the book of estimates, and is accessible to the gentleman or any other Member of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to disturb this delightful colloquy by making the point of no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am very sorry the gentleman will not let us read the bill a little further.

Mr. MADDEN. You have done so well to-day——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We have not done as much as we did yesterday.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, you have done very well indeed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SOLDIERS' INSURANCE.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up at this time and pass Senate joint resolution 133.

Mr. DYER. Let it be reported and see what it is, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. We will find out what it is. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read S. J. Res. 133, authorizing the granting of insurance under the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved October 6, 1917, on application by a person other than the person to be insured, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That insurance under the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved October 6, 1917, shall be granted by the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance on application made by the person to be insured or, subject to such regulations as the bureau may prescribe, by any other person.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have the gentleman from Texas explain whether this is simply to provide for the application for insurance of men who are in the trenches, and who are not able to make a personal application, by some one on their behalf?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is. The right to take out this insurance expires April 12. The law now is that the soldier himself must make the application, or if another person makes application, the soldier must indorse the application. That is impossible for some men now in the service, because some have been captured by the Germans, and they have no chance whatever to make the application themselves or to indorse the application that may be made for them. This would cover such cases as that. I feel it would be a great injustice to these men not to give them any chance whatever to take out this insurance.

Mr. DYER. Is that the only exception—those who may be prisoners?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; this is general.

Mr. DYER. Relatives of the man in France could make the application.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; but this does not change the law at all. It does not change the law as to whom the insurance shall go. It does not allow anybody to speculate on the insurance with reference to these soldiers.

Mr. FOSTER. It only permits those to make the application who might be benefited under the law.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says "the indorsement of the soldier," but you might not be able to get at him.

Mr. RAYBURN. This is to do away with that requirement.

Mr. CANNON. So that any relative or one who is interested in him, or through selfishness, might make the application.

Mr. RAYBURN. Selfishness would not have anything to do with it, because the law provides that this insurance shall only go to a certain class of people, and this does not change that at all.

Mr. CANNON. I can see how it might be abused, and still I am not going to object to it.

Mr. GILLETT. Let me ask the gentleman, has this been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; but it has been reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It passed the Senate a few days ago.

Mr. GILLETT. As I heard it read it provides that anybody can make the application for the soldier.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Then why does it not allow anyone to do it for speculation?

Mr. RAYBURN. Because the law says that the insurance can go to nobody but certain ones. I will read the law if the gentleman wishes.

Mr. GILLETT. I understand what the gentleman means. But why does not it allow anybody—I do not know that they would have any motive for doing it, but without regard to whether the soldier was in a condition to do it himself or not, I wondered whether it ought not to be limited so that it would apply to the soldier who could not do it himself.

Mr. RAYBURN. That would involve a lot of proof that would put some in a position that we do not want to put them in.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, along the line suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, take the case of a soldier who might not wish to take out insurance to the full amount. For instance, if the soldier only wished to carry $2,000 somebody might take out insurance for the additional amount up to $10,000. Why should the Government carry it for $10,000 for the beneficiary who would receive the insurance. I realize that there is a necessity in the case instanced by the gentleman from Texas where the soldier could not obtain the insurance because he is a prisoner, or some condition like that. But why should it not be restricted to these exigent conditions. I presume the gentleman is not in favor of allowing even relatives or a stranger to take out insurance to the full amount designated to the beneficiary in the existing law should the soldier not approve.

Mr. RAYBURN. I should not say I was in favor of that; but if we pass this we have got to set aside some of these things. I think it would do the soldier a greater injustice if he was a captive and could not take out the insurance than it would to put more insurance on him than he wanted to take out.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not covered by the regulations of the department?

Mr. STAFFORD. These regulations would grant them the privilege of allowing a stranger to take out the maximum amount for the benefit of the designated beneficiary. Why can not you restrict it so as to provide for those who are not in a position to take it out for themselves?

Mr. RAYBURN. That would call for proof, and it would be April 12 before the proof could be developed.

Mr. STAFFORD. We could throw the protecting arm over such soldiers. I do not think any person here wishes to allow a stranger, or even a relative, to take out the full amount of insurance on a soldier's life if the soldier does not wish it. The Government is not in the business for that purpose.

Mr. RAYBURN. I understand that; but this is a proposition to try to accommodate the soldiers who are in a position where they can not apply for themselves.

Mr. STAFFORD. But we are amending the law for all time.

Mr. RAYBURN. He does not have to keep it up.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the stranger is the one to keep it up; it is not the soldier. The stranger can take out insurance for the beneficiary.

Mr. SEARS. Does not the soldier have to pay the insurance?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at all, under this provision. The soldier may pay it, but under this a stranger might.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is subject to regulations of the Treasury Department, and I do not think the Treasury Department would make an order allowing a stranger to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. From the testimony of Mr. De Lanoy, he prophesied that this war insurance was going to grow so that we would be in the business for all time.

Mr. RAYBURN. We are, so long as these men live.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that it will be branched out to take in others than the soldiers.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think that comes in this proposition; but as long as these men live, under the law now, and they want to pay their premiums, we are going to have this bureau.

Mr. STAFFORD. I see the necessity for throwing the protecting arm of the Government around these soldiers, but——

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not see any excuse for limiting this thing, except in one way—and I do not know that that would be wise—and not allow anybody outside of a permitted class to make application for the soldier.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withdraw this until to-morrow? I do not think there will be any objection to its consideration.

Mr. CANNON. Could a creditor take the insurance?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; but this is not assignable to a creditor.

Mr. CANNON. Can a creditor take out the insurance to secure himself?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; he could not secure himself, because this insurance is not assignable.

Mr. CANNON. The law designates who can be the beneficiary?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will it not be assignable after the termination of the war?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not as long as it is Government insurance.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection to withdrawing this and bringing it up to-morrow?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; except that I fear the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will object, as he will know it will take as much time then as now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. For the present I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CLARK of Florida for one week, on account of important business.
